

DE QUINCEY'S COLLECTED WRITINGS

VOL. V

BIOGRAPHIES AND BIOGRAPHIC SKETCHES

CONTENTS OF VOL V

	PAGE
EDITOR'S PREFACE	1
DR SAMUEL PARR, OR WHIGGISM IN ITS RELATIONS TO LITERATURE . . . . .	9
POSTSCRIPT	129
APPENDED NOTES . . . . .	132
ANECDOTAGE. MISS HAWKINS'S ANECDOTES. . . . .	146
THE MARQUESS WELLESLEY . . . . .	165
COLERIDGE AND OPIUM-EATING . . . . .	179
POSTSCRIPT	212
CHARLES LAMB . . . . .	215
PROFESSOR WILSON—
I SKETCH IN 1829 . . . . .	259
II SKETCH IN 1850 . . . . .	289
SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON . . . . .	303
APPENDED NOTE. . . . .	348
CHARLEMAGNE . . . . .	352
JOAN OF ARC . . . . .	384

EDITOR'S PREFACE

THE papers included in this volume, like those in the last, were written at different points of De Quincey's life, and are culled from different periodicals. The long opening paper, entitled "Dr Parr, or Whiggism in its Relations to Literature," but containing a great deal more than could be guessed from that title, and altogether one of the most fascinating specimens of De Quincey in what may be called his mischievous biographico-satirical vein, was a contribution to Blackwood in 1831. The amusing little paper called "Anecdote" was one of his contributions to the London Magazine in 1823; the pleasant little biographic sketch of the Marquess Wellesley appeared in Tait's Magazine in 1846, "Coleridge and Opium-Eating" is a very interesting Blackwood paper of 1845, and the fine paper on Charles Lamb was written in 1848 for the North British Review. Of the two sketches of Professor Wilson, the first and more careful is of date 1829, and has been resuscitated from the columns of a long-defunct weekly once known as the Edinburgh Literary Gazette, while the other and slighter is of date 1850, and from the later and less-forgotten Edinburgh weekly called Hogg's Instructor. The valuable but strangely whimsical sketch entitled "Sir William Hamilton" was a contribution in 1852 to the same Hogg's Instructor, and the two closing papers of more distant historical range, entitled "Charlemagne" and "Joan of Arc," take us back respectively to Blackwood of 1832 and Tait of 1847. While further particulars in this chronology may be reserved for notes at the beginnings of the papers severally, it is well that the reader should be aware beforehand that in this volume, as in the last, there are brought together products of De Quincey's pen on different occasions, and in different sets of circumstances, through many years of his busy literary life.

The first seven of the biographic sketches, it will be observed, relate to persons and subjects contemporary with De Quincey himself, so that in treating them he could draw from his own observations and recollections, and not merely, as in most of the biographies in last volume, from books and tradition. These seven papers, accordingly, have been arranged pretty much in the order of their subjects. Dr. Parr comes first, as, though quite within De Quincey's memory and known to De Quincey by actual contact, yet on the whole more an eighteenth-century object than a figure of the nineteenth; Miss Hawkins's Anecdotes, though some of them are scraps from the Johnsonian world of the eighteenth century prior to Parr's connexion with it, may follow Parr, as coming from the memory of a lady who was Parr's junior; after which, in the Marquess Wellesley, Coleridge, Lamb, Professor Wilson, and Sir William Hamilton, we are distinctly among De Quincey's coevals. The last four, indeed, were personal friends of his, of whom he had again and again made mention in his writings, and of three of whom,—Coleridge, Lamb, and Wilson,—we have already had sketches from him in his Autobiographic Reminiscences. This reappearance of Coleridge, Lamb, and Wilson in the present volume, to be sketched again, with Sir William Hamilton now in their company, is, indeed, a feature of the volume that cannot escape remark. It is worth some attention on De Quincey's own account.

In few lives, of notable intellectual distinction otherwise, is there such evidence as in De Quincey's of the possession, in almost inordinate degree from the first, of the beautiful quality of affection for individual living contemporaries, rising into sustained veneration for the two or three of these who could be regarded as topmost and supreme. The first living contemporary to whom De Quincey bowed in adoring allegiance was Wordsworth. O! how, in his boyhood, he had yearned towards that man in the Lakes, whom he had not yet seen; and how, in later years, becoming a denizen of the Lakes himself, he tried to wind his own life, ivy-like, round that stationary oak ! Hardly less, and indeed larger on that side of his nature which inclined him to speculative philosophy and scholarly erudition, was his allegiance to Coleridge, his acquaintanceship with whom had preceded that with Wordsworth, though it was less continuous in the sequel. Those two, Wordsworth and Coleridge, were De Quincey's chiefs in the England of his own prime ; but there were other and minor, or at all events later and different, attachments. The gentle Charles Lamb, who won all hearts, had won De Quincey's by special kindness to De Quincey himself in London, no less than by the charms of his peculiar literary genius. Then, how De Quincey,—from the moment that he and his magnificent physical contrast, the athletic Wilson, had been brought into companionship in the Lake district, trudging together for days, the strangest of possible couples, over its roads and mountains,—how the little De Quincey took to this Hercules-Apollo as somehow his predestined brother, and admired him and loved him ! The friendship with Wilson led to De Quincey's first visit to Edinburgh in 1814, under Wilson's convoy, and so, by ramification, to acquaintanceship with some of Wilson's Edinburgh friends, Sir William Hamilton in the number. These are by no means all, there were others to whom, in various places and on various grounds, De Quincey had related himself by more or less of enthusiastic liking. Not, of course, but that these personal likings and admuations of De Quincey were counterbalanced by equally strong, and perhaps equally numerous, personal antipathies. There were contemporaries of De Quincey, eminent in their day, to whom his antipathy was open and constant, to the pitch in some cases of the violently unreasonable, or even the rancorous and malicious,—partly perhaps from the same constitutional necessity that determined his sympathies and reverences, but sometimes too visibly from reckless political partisanship. Now, when De Quincey, after his thirty-six years of silent student-life, broke forth as a man of letters, seeking a livelihood by contributions to magazines and other miscellanies, and when, as it happened, his most available matter, and the most acceptable for popular effect, in this new industry, consisted to a large extent of such reminiscences as he could draw from his own life,—accounts of celebrities he had seen and known, and of the impressions they had made on himself,—was it so wonderful that Wordsworth, Coleridge, Charles Lamb, Wilson, and others of his highest favourites, on the one hand, with now and then a black sheep, or a blackish sheep, from the other list, should form the subjects of his articles? It is to his credit that, though he did now and then bring in a victim from the list of those he disliked, or liked but slenderly and thought over-rated,—e.g. Dr Parr,—the larger proportion of his published recollections concerned those whom he could speak of affectionately and admiringly, and were testimonies intended for their honour. Here, however, is a peculiarity distinguishing De Quincey from the herd of common eulogists. Not only does he never make a swan out of a demonstrably inferior bird, but he is critically frank, humorously shrewd and clear-sighted, in his exhibitions of the swans themselves. From the first moment of his introduction to Wordsworth, intense to idolatry as had been his youthful worship of the very name of Wordsworth, one can see that his attachment even to this most stately and exacting of his seniors was not that of a slavish adherent, conscious of being himself a nobody, but that of an independent younger intellect, becomingly deferential in the presence of greatness, but that could observe sharply, reason coolly, detect foibles, and be amused by them, even while it yielded homage. So through De Quincey's intercourse with Coleridge. The demigod remained a demigod, but a demigod clouded and obscured. So, too, in the other cases. When De Quincey sat and conversed with Lamb, it was with De Quincey's eyes that he was looking all the while at the delightful humourist and essayist, finding that he was really as delightful and as good as all people said he was, but nevertheless taking his measure. Then, to come from the seniors to De Quincey's friends of his own age, does any one think that, while he and Wilson were walking together amid the scenery of the Lakes, and the physically smaller of the two men had to look up a foot or two every time he wanted to share the laugh on the jovial face of the larger, there were not moments when the smaller man had to resort mentally to his private intellectual gauge for testing the worth of his radiant comrade's ideas on all deeper matters in comparison with what he himself carried in stock? Hence, accordingly, in all those celebrated sketches by De Quincey of the contemporaries he admired and honoured most, the presence always of a critical element,—the interfusion of qualifying comment or actual banter with the eulogy, the hinting or specifying of defects, the relapse from the subject of the eulogy as he might deservedly appear to the public through his public performances to the man himself on that closer inspection against which not even Adam, as the angel told him, could be quite safe,—

“Thy mate, who sees when thou art seen least wise”

Not the less, however, although De Quincey's admirations of those who in his reckoning were the best of his contemporaries were thus all avowedly reasoned admirations, admirations of limited liability, have we to note his loyalty to them. Of this the re-expression of so many of them in the present volume is a strong proof. In the various sketches of Wordsworth which may be read in previous volumes there has been no deficiency of criticism of Wordsworth personally, and in one of them there is a special account of those harshnesses of Wordsworth's character and demeanour which had caused De Quincey's estrangement from him at last. In like manner we have heard of De Quincey's quarrel with Coleridge on the precious question of their relative degrees of guilt in the matter of opium-eating, and have seen the worst that De Quincey had to say of his old friend in that connexion. Nor in the previous sketches of Charles Lamb and Wilson was the amanus aliquid totally wanting. In the return to these four in the present volume, however, there is no increase of the critical mood, but rather a proclamation of unabated fidelity to the old allegiances. There is, indeed, no express new paper on Wordsworth (a paper of 1845 on Wordsworth's poetry having to be reserved for a future volume because of its non-biographical character); but every mention of Wordsworth's name, or quotation from him, attests continued loyalty to that surviving patriarch of English poetry. Coleridge had been dead eleven years when De Quincey penned the article entitled "Coleridge and Opium-Eating"; but that article, despite its title, is in the main a parting tribute to the memory of the man whom De Quincey still believed to have been, in some intellectual respects, the most extraordinary Englishman of his generation. The paper on Charles Lamb surpasses what De Quincey had previously written about Lamb for beauty and completeness of appreciation. To learn what De Quincey really thought of his magnificent friend Wilson, the Christopher North of Blackwood, one must go rather to the two sketches of Wilson in the present volume, and especially to the first of them than to the brief sketch included in the series of the Autobiographic Reminiscences. Finally, it is in the present volume, for the first time, that we see De Quincey in actual contact with Sir William Hamilton, and learn, though in the oddest fashion in which such an abstruse subject was ever handled for the entertainment of readers of popular periodicals, what De Quincey thought of that since famous Scottish philosopher, his enormous and miscellaneous scholarship, and the worth of his slashing innovations upon the Scholastic Logic.

From Christopher North and Sir William Hamilton to pass to Charlemagne and Joan of Arc is certainly a long leap backwards. The closing papers on these subjects, however, have really their proper place among De Quincey's biographical sketches; and one reason for placing them last in the volumes containing the Biographic Sketches is that they seem to form a fit transition to the "Historical Essays and Researches" which are to come in the next two volumes. Both papers are worth reading. In the "Charlemagne," after some excellent introductory observations on History in general, De Quincey fastens on the great Frankish conqueror and emperor of the eighth and ninth centuries, chiefly with the view of contrasting him with Napoleon Bonaparte, the French conqueror and emperor of the eighteenth and nineteenth. De Quincey's prejudice against the modern French generally having been notoriously one of his most extravagant characteristics, and Napoleon Bonaparte in particular having been notoriously one of his life-long abominations, the contrast is so furiously to the disadvantage of the modern French as compared with the Franks, and of Napoleon as compared with Charlemagne, that a careful reader may do well to adjourn the question for further investigation, only thanking this advocate for his eloquent pleading on one of the sides. The reception of the "Joan of Arc" may be different. Here, as if to vindicate himself from the imputation of being incapable of doing justice to the French or to anything in French History, De Quincey calls upon all Frenchmen to listen to what he, an Englishman, after Voltaire's old French ribaldries and the hesitancies of M. Michelet and other later Frenchmen, will say in honour of the heroic maid. It is the passages of fine lyrical prose at the opening and the close of the paper that chiefly recommend it now, and cause it to be remembered as De Quincey's. A good deal of the intermediate matter (of facetious disputation with M. Michelet, and what not) may seem unpleasantly out of key.

D. M.

DR. SAMUEL PARR ;

OR,

WHIGGISM IN ITS RELATIONS TO LITERATURE <sup>1</sup>

SECTION I

THE time is come when, without offence, the truth may be spoken of Dr. Parr.<sup>2</sup> Standing too near to a man's grave, <sup>1</sup> Originally published in Blackwood's Magazine for January, February, May, and June 1831, under the title, "Dr. Parr and His Contemporaries," and in the guise of a review of these three books —(1) The Works of Samuel Parr, D D, with Memours, &c., by John Johnstone, M.D, in 8 vols., London 1828 ; (2) Memours of Dr Parr, &c., by the Rev William Field, in 2 vols, London 1828 ; (3) Parriana, or Notices of the Rev. Samuel Parr, LL.D, by E. H. Barker, Esq, London 1828. De Quincey, besides changing the title of the papers in his reprint of them in 1857 for the sixth volume of his Collective Writings, revised them carefully, making alterations, omissions, and additions. He also threw the original footnotes to the papers, or most of them, into an Appendix, as they appear in this volume —M.

<sup>2</sup> Twenty-five years ago, I felt strong scruples in approaching the subject of Dr. Parr, so much had a partisan interest invested the Doctor : he was known, in fact, too well, and too polemically. But mark how things change. at this moment it may be questioned whether one reader in three thousand of readers belonging to this present generation is likely to be aware who the Doctor was, or upon what pretensions rest his claims to commemoration. Most people will suppose him to be that Parr whose glorification arises from having started in the trade of living during the reign of Henry VII and wound up the concern during that of Charles II. But they will find themselves mistaken. The Doctor belonged entirely to the Georgian era : and his reputation is built upon that variety of scholarship all writers who have trained themselves to habits of liberal sympathy and of generous forbearance—all, in short, but the very juvenile and thoughtless, or the very malignant—put a seal upon their lips. Grief, and the passionate exaggerations of grief, have then a title cheerfully recognised to indulgent consideration. On this principle, I prescribed to myself most willingly a duty of absolute silence at the time of Dr. Parr's death,<sup>1</sup> and through the years immediately succeeding. The sorrow of his numerous friends was at that time keen and raw. For a warm-hearted man—and Dr. Parr was such—there is an answerable warmth of regret. Errors and indiscretions that made themselves painfully felt amongst his living associates are then no longer remembered, virtues are brought forward into high relief; talents and accomplishments are excusably magnified beyond all proportions of truth; and even frailties that operated most injuriously upon the comfort of his friends are now regarded as mere natural expressions of a flesh-and-blood which connects itself with full-blown pedantry. He was a pedagogue; and among the last of that generation that sternly contended for the necessity of unlimited flagellation. He flagellated many distinguished scions of aristocratic families, both Whigs and Tories, many of whom thought vindictively on the subject of the Doctor, and were of opinion that the reverend gentleman would have benefited much by receiving tithes, which so sternly he exacted upon all other subjects of culture, from the inhuman amount of scourgings annually reported as "reaped" in his own private practice. A pedant, it may be thought, can have no historic value. But even amongst pedants there are better and worse; more and less meritorious. Extraordinary erudition, even though travelling into obscure and sterile fields, has its own peculiar interest. And about Dr. Parr, moreover, there circled another and far different interest. His profession as a schoolmaster, his reputed learning, and his political creed as a Whig, brought him into direct personal intercourse with the great Whig leaders in Parliament. By looking forward to Section the Second of this paper on Parr, my reader will find that (however scandalous such a fact may seem) Dr. Parr corresponded with one-half of our British Peerage, with select members of the royal family, and with the Episcopal Bench of that Church which daily he insulted. But a deeper interest will arise by anticipation when I promise him an access through this same pedant to the letters of Fox in relation to the principles of Burke. Such letters, on such a theme, will hang with gold bullion even the records of a pedant.

<sup>1</sup> He was born in 1747, and died in 1825 —M.

humanity, that uttered itself in a language of fiery strength. These extravagances are even graceful under the immediate impulses which prompt them; and for a season they are, and ought to be, indulged. But this season has its limits. Within those limits the rule is—De mortuis nil nisi bonum.<sup>1</sup> Beyond them, and when the privilege of recent death can no longer be sustained, this rule gives way to another—De mortuis nil nisi demonstrabile. This canon has now taken effect with regard to Dr. Parr. The sanctities of private grief must surely have received a sufficient homage, now that the grief itself has submitted to the mitigations of time. Enough has been conceded to the intemperance of sorrowing friendship: the time has at last arrived for the dispassionate appreciation of unbiassed equity.

<sup>1</sup> “De mortuis nil nisi bonum” —This famous canon of charity (“Concerning the dead let us have nothing but what is kind and favourable”) has furnished an inevitable occasion for much doubtful casuistry. The dead, as those pre-eminently unable to defend themselves, enjoy a natural privilege of indulgence amongst the generous and considerate; but not to the extent which this sweeping maxim would proclaim, since, on this principle, in cases innumerable tenderness to the dead would become the ground of cruel injustice to the living. Nay, the maxim would continually counterwork itself; for too inexorable a forbearance with regard to one dead person would oftentimes effectually close the door to the vindication of another. In fact, neither history nor biography is able to move a step without infractions of this rule, a rule emanating from the blind kindness of grandmothers, who, whilst groping in the dark after one individual darling, forget the collateral or oblique results to others without end. These evils being perceived, equitable casuists began to revise the maxim, and in its new form it stood thus—“De mortuis nil nisi verum” (“Concerning the dead let us have nothing but what is true”). Why, certainly that is an undeniable right of the dead; and nobody in his senses would plead for a small percentage of falsehood. Yet, again, in that shape, the maxim carries with it a disagreeable air of limiting the right to truth. Unless it is meant to reserve a small allowance of fiction for the separate use of the living, why insist upon truth as peculiarly consecrated to the dead? If all people, living and dead alike, have a right to the benefits of truth, why specify one class, as if in silent contradistinction to some other class, less eminently privileged in that respect? To me it seems evident that the human mind has been long groping darkly after some separate right of the dead in this respect, but which hitherto it has not been able to bring into reconciliation with the known rights of the living. Some distinct privilege there should be, if only it could be sharply defined and limited, through which a special prerogative might be recognised as amongst the sanctities of the grave.

Many are the years which have passed away since I first set eyes upon Dr Samuel Parr. Off and on through the nine or ten years preceding, I had heard him casually mentioned in Oxford, but not for any good. In most cases, the occasion which suggested the mention of his unamiable name was some pointless parody of a Sam-Johnsonian increpation, some Drury-Lane counterfeit of the true Jovian thunderbolts. In no instance that I recollect had there appeared any felicity in these fulminations of Dr Parr. With an unlimited licence of personal invective, and with an extravagance of brutality not credible, except in the case of one who happened to be protected by age and by his petticoats, — consequently with one power more than other people enjoy, who submit themselves to the restraints and decencies of social intercourse,—the Doctor had yet made nothing of his extra privilege. not so much as once had he attained a distinguished success. There was labour, indeed, and effort enough, preparation without end, and most tortuous circumgyration of periods; but from all this sonorous smithery of harsh words, dark and pompous, nothing adequate emerged,—nothing commensurate,—but simply a voluminous smoke for the Doctor was a patron of tobacco in a degree which made him the horror of ladies, and which in all respects reached a point of excess not often heard of except on the right bank of the Rhine and the left bank of the Danube. In smoke the Doctor's day commenced; in smoke it closed; smoke literal and abominable to his ox and his ass, to his man-servant and his maid-servant, and to the stranger that was within his gates. But to me there seemed always to settle a smoke symbolical upon the whole sum of the Doctor's life—all that he did, and all that he tried to do. At length a day arrived on which the Fates had resolved that I should see Dr. Parr in the flesh.

The scene of this little affair was a front drawing-room in the London mansion of a Chancery barrister, Mr. Basil Montagu, eminent in himself, and foremost amongst Dr. Parr's friends. Here was collected a crowd of morning visitors to Mrs. Montagu . time—say 3 P.M. on a summer day in the year 1812 and in a back drawing-room was heard, at intervals, the clamorous laugh of Dr. Samuel Parr, then recently arrived from the country upon a visit to his London friend. The miscellaneous company assembled were speedily apprised who was the owner of that obstreperous laugh—so monstrously beyond the key of good society, it transpired, also, who it was that provoked the laugh, and in a subdued key sometimes accompanied that laugh; it was the very celebrated Bobus Smith. And, as a hope was expressed that one or both of these gentlemen might soon appear amongst us, most of the company lingered, in the very reasonable expectation of seeing Dr. Sam,—but I myself on the very doubtful chance of seeing Mr. Bobus. Many of my junior readers, who cannot count back so far as to the year in question (1812), are likely to be much at a loss for the particular kind of celebrity which could possibly illustrate a name so little known to these present days as this of Bobus Smith. I interrupt, therefore, my little account of Dr Parr, with the slightest outline of Mr. Smith's story and his pretensions. Bobus, then, was a brother of the Rev. Sydney Smith, already at that time well known as a wit and humorist, but through the next thirty and forty years even more so. Mr. Robert Smith, however, even then held the higher place in the esteem of his own domestic circle; for originality and power. How he came to be known as Bobus arose naturally thus: Robert being Latinised by adding the ordinary termination us, it was a playful expression of analogy to Latinise the familiar abbreviation Bob by the same process, as Bobus. At Cambridge, where he had drawn public attention upon himself by Latin philosophic verses, framed on the model externally of Lucretius (re as regards archaic forms of language), and otherwise much in the spirit of the Lucretian grandeur as to Orphic enthusiasm and fiery movement,—all these metrical essays, having been signed Bobus Smith, had naturally made him known to the public under that signature.<sup>1</sup> But these were the playful ἀγώνισ-

<sup>1</sup> “That signature”—the first syllable not being pronounced short, as in the English name Bob, but long, as in Bobus, the dative plural of the word bos by contraction for bovibus.

ματα, the rope-dancing trials of skill, that belonged to the earlier stages of his manhood. His maturer years exposed a loftier scale of ambition. Already, in the year 1808 or 1809, I had been told (whether truly or not) that Mr. Bobus had some years before announced his determination to do two little things, neither of which is easy, but one of which may be viewed as a sort of stepping-stone to the other, so that the two jointly may be easier to do than the last singly. The first was—to create a fortune of sufficient magnitude in Bengal. Secondly, by and through the leverage of that Indian fortune, to vault by a hop-step-and-jump into the post of prime minister. A man armed with such a spirit of learned judgment upon life as Mr. Bobus could not be ignorant that to such a grand result there must co-operate not merely many a splendid intellectual gift, but also many a splendid gift of fortune—many a splendid connexion—many a splendid opportunity—many a splendid combination of chance and skill—and yet, with all this knowledge, Mr. Bobus was willing to stand the risk of the dice; or else, in open defiance of the dice, was willing to throw himself, in faith upon his own intellectual supremacy, such as he conceived it to be. At last the fortune was made; secondly, it was remitted, and then, thirdly, Mr. Bobus thought of remitting himself. “He’s coming!” said a whisper from somebody, that might upon consideration be Mr. Bobus himself. “He’s coming!” echoed many whispers. “He’s come!” was at last announced. And all the world of those in the secret stood on tiptoe, waiting for the result. He took the necessary steps for prosecuting his self-created mission: he caused himself to be returned to Parliament for some close borough, he took his seat; on a fitting occasion he prepared to utter his maiden oration, for that purpose he raised himself bolt upright upon his pins; all the world was hushed: you might have heard not merely a pin, but even a needle, drop. At this critical moment of his life, upon which all his vast cloud-built fabrics of ambition were suspended, when, if ever, he was called upon to converge all his energies, suddenly his presence of mind forsook him; he faltered; rudder and compass slipped away from him, and—oh! Castor and Pollux!—Bobus floundered! nor, from that day to this, has he been heard of in the courts of ambition. This catastrophe had occurred some time before the present occasion, and an event which entirely extinguished the world's interest in Mr. Bobus Smith had more than doubled my own. Consequently I waited with much solicitude. At length the door opened; which recalls me from my digression into the high-road of my theme. For not Mr. Bobus Smith entered, who would have compelled me to continue the digression, but simply Dr. Parr, who in one moment compelled me to close it.

Nobody announced him, and we were left to collect his name from his dress and his conversation. Hence it happened that for some time I was disposed to question myself whether this might not be Mr. Bobus even (little as it could be supposed to resemble him) rather than Dr. Parr, so much did he contradict all my rational preconceptions. "A man," said I, "who has insulted people so outrageously, ought not to have done this in single reliance upon his professional protections; a brave man, and a man of honour, would here have carried about with him, in his manner and deportment, some such language as this — 'Do not think that I shelter myself under my gown from the natural consequences of the affronts I offer, mortal combats I am forbidden, sir, as a Christian minister, to engage in; but, as I find it impossible to refrain from occasional licence of tongue, I am very willing to fight a few rounds in a ring, with any gentleman who fancies himself ill used.'" Let me not be misunderstood; I do not contend that Dr. Parr should often, or regularly, have offered this species of satisfaction. But I do insist upon it that no man should have given the very highest sort of provocation so wantonly as Dr. Parr is recorded to have done, unless conscious that, in a last extremity, he was ready, like a brave man, to undertake a short turn-up, in a private room, with any person whatsoever whom he had insulted past endurance. A doctor who had so often tempted (which is a kind way of saying—had merited) a cudgelling ought himself to have had some ability to cudgel. Dr. Johnson assuredly would have acted on that principle. Had volume the second of that same folio with which he floored Osborne happened to lie ready to the prostrate man's grasp, nobody can suppose that Johnson would have disputed Osborne's right to retaliate; in which case a regular succession of rounds would have been established. Considerations such as these, and Dr. Parr's undeniable reputation (granted even by his most admiring biographers) as a sanguinary flagellator throughout his long career of pedagogue, had prepared me—nay, entitled me—to expect in Dr. Parr a huge carcase of man, fourteen stone at the least. Even his style, puffy and bloated, and his sesquipedalian words, all warranted the same expectation. Hence, then, my surprise, and the perplexity I have recorded, when the door opened, and a little man, in a most plebeian wig (far, indeed, from that wig of his which the “Edinburgh Review” of eight or nine years earlier had described as the mighty astonishment, or, in Greek, the μέγα θαύμα of barbers), cut his way through the company, and made for a fauteuil standing opposite to the fire. Into this he lunged, and then forthwith, without preface or apology, began to open his talk upon the room. Here arose a new marvel, and a greater. If I had been scandalised at Dr. Parr's want of thews and bulk, conditions so indispensable for enacting the part of Sam Johnson, much more, and with better reason, was I now petrified with his voice, utterance, gestures, and demeanour. Conceive, reader, by way of counterpoise to the fine classical pronunciation<sup>1</sup> of Dr. Johnson, an infantine lisp—the worst I ever heard—from the lips of a man above sixty, and accompanied with all sorts of ridiculous grimaces and little stage gesticulations. As he sat in his chair, turning alternately to the right and to the left, that he might distribute his edification in equal proportions amongst us, he seemed the very image of a little French gossiping abbé.

Yet all that I have mentioned was, and seemed to be, a trifle by comparison with the infinite pettiness of his matter. Nothing did he utter but little shreds of calumnious tattle—the most ineffably silly and frivolous of all that was then circulating in the Whig salons of London against the Regent. I ought, by the way, to have prefaced my little narrative by mentioning that about this summer of 1812 the Whig party had perfected their sense of a perfidy to themselves on the part of the Regent. In 1810 it happened that George III accomplished as a king what is called the golden jubilee. The twenty-fifth year of any connexion—as, for instance, of a marriage—is called the silver jubilee; but the fiftieth year the golden. This had been celebrated with peculiar enthusiasm by the nation; and it was supposed that the nervous sympathies of the king had been too powerfully called into activity by such parts of the festivities as could not, with every care, be wholly withdrawn from his participation. Out of this excitement arose a second insanity. On the first, when the Prince of Wales was a very young and indiscreet man, Mr Pitt's party was not disposed to have lodged much power in his Royal Highness's hands, and none at all as due by any constitutional right. But things were altered now: the Florizel<sup>1</sup> that had been sowing his wild oats in the former lunacy was now an elderly man; his Perdidas, one and all, were dead and buried, and, what was of even more importance, it seemed too probable (as in fact happened) that this second lunacy would not depart unless in company with life. The new Regent might now, therefore, be regarded as virtually king. This trebled his value to that party which should now succeed in winning his confidence. But on such a question what room for a doubt? Surely that party which had stood by him through life possessed a paramount claim on his gratitude. True; but paramount to all private claims was that of Britain and of Europe. Was the war in Spain to be maintained or not? The Whigs had so used this great question as an engine of partisan attack upon their opponents that it had become impossible for them, with any colour of consistency, to do otherwise than withdraw the British armies from the Peninsula. That one point settled the case ; and upon that argument, just at this time in 1812, the wrath of the Whig party was culminating.

<sup>1</sup> Boswell, whose ear was peculiarly quick, and whose sensibilities, to the better and the worse, in this accomplishment were fastidiously cultivated—for, in his English residences, he made a diligent use of his numerous introductions to the élite of English society—has some where noticed expressly the singular beauty which distinguished Dr. Johnson's accentuation and intonation of English.

<sup>1</sup> “The Florizel” —See Shakspeare's “Winter's Tale.” At this great distance of time, when seventy years or so have intervened, it becomes necessary to mention that the beautiful Mrs. Robinson, who was the first love of the Prince of Wales, originally caught his eye in performing the part of Perdita in this exquisite drama.

He began precisely in these words : " Oh ! I shall tell you " (laying a stress upon the word shall, which still further aided the resemblance to a Frenchman) " a sto-hee " (hispingly for story) " about the Pince Thegent " (such was his nearest approximation to Prince Regent) " Oh, the Pince Thegent ! —the Pince Thegent !—what a sad, sad man he has turned out ! But you shall hear Oh, what a Pince!—what a Thegent !—what a sad Pince Thegent ! " And so the old babbler went on, sometimes wringing his hands in lamentation, sometimes flourishing them with French grimaces and shrugs of shoulders, sometimes expanding and contracting his fingers like a fan. After an hour's twaddle of this scandalous description, suddenly he rose, and hopped out of the room, exclaiming all the way, " Oh, what a Pince !—Oh, what a Thegent ! Is it a Thegent, is it a Pince, that you call this man ? Oh, what a sad Pince ! Did anybody ever hear of such a sad Pince !—such a sad Thegent !—such a sad, sad Pince Thegent ? Oh, what a Pince ! " &c , da capo.

Not without indignation did I exclaim to myself, on this winding-up of the scene, " And so this, then, this lithping slander-monger, and retailer of gossip fit rather for washer-women over their tea than for scholars and statesmen, is the champion whom his party would propound as the adequate antagonist of Samuel Johnson ! Faugh ! "—— I had occasion, in this instance, as in so many others which I have witnessed, to remark the conflict between the natural and the artificial (or adopted) opinions of the world, and the practical triumph of the first. A crowd of ladies were present ; most of them had been taught to believe that Dr. Parr was a prodigious scholar, and in some mysterious way, and upon something not exactly known or understood, except by learned men, a great authority. Accordingly, upon his first entrance, all of them were awed—deep silence prevailed—and the hush of indefinite expectation Two minutes dispersed that feeling ; the Doctor spoke, and the spell was broken. No sooner was the style and tendency of Dr. Parr's gossip apparent than a large majority of those present broke up into little parties, entered upon their own affairs, and, by a tacit convention, agreed to consider the Doctor as addressing himself exclusively to the lady of the house and her immediate circle. Had Sam Johnson been the talker nobody would have presumed to do this, secondly, nobody would have been so indiscreet as to do this—he would not have acknowledged weariness had he felt it; but, lastly, nobody would have wished to do this—weariness was impossible in the presence of Sam Johnson. Neither let it be said that perhaps the ladies present were unintellectual, and careless of a scholar's conversation. They were not so, all were tinctured with literature, and one or two of distinguished talents. And I can undertake to say that any man of tolerable colloquial powers, speaking upon a proper topic, would have commanded the readiest attention. As it was, every one felt (if she did not even whisper to her neighbour), "Here, at least, is nothing to be learned."

Such was my own first interview with Dr. Parr; such its issue. And now let me explain my drift in thus detailing its circumstances. Some people will say, the drift was doubtless to exhibit Dr. Parr in a disadvantageous light—as a petty gossip, and a man of mean personal appearance. No, by no means. Far from it. I, that write this paper, have myself a mean personal appearance, and I love men of mean appearance<sup>1</sup>. Having one spur more than other men to seek distinction in those paths where nature has not obstructed them, they have one additional chance (and a great one) for giving an extended development to their intellectual powers. Many a man has risen to eminence under the powerful reaction of his mind in fierce counter-agency (sometimes even, more nobly, in grand benignant indifference) to the scorn of the unworthy daily evoked by his personal defects, who with a handsome person would have sunk into the luxury of a careless life under the tranquillising smiles of continual admiration. Dr. Parr, therefore, lost nothing in my esteem by showing a meanish exterior. Yet even this was worth mentioning, and had a value in reference to my present purpose. I like Dr. Parr. I may say, even, that I love him, for some noble qualities of heart that really did belong to him, and were continually breaking out in the midst of his singular infirmities. But this, or a far nobler moral character than Dr. Parr's, can offer no excuse for giving a false elevation to his intellectual pretensions, and raising him to a level which he will be found incapable of-keeping when the props of partial friendship are withdrawn. My object is to value Dr. Parr's claims, and to assign his true station both in literature and in those other walks of life upon which he has come forward as a public man. With such a purpose before me, it cannot be wholly irrelevant to notice even Dr. Parr's person, and to say that it was at once coarse and in some degree mean; for his too friendly biographers have repeatedly made his personal appearance the subject of flattery, and more than once have expressly characterised it as "dignified,"—which it was not, according to any possible standard of dignity, but far otherwise; and it is a good inference (is it not?) from such a mis-statement to other mis-statements grosser and more injuriously misleading. His person was poor, and his features were coarse and ignoble, with an air, at the same time, of drollery, that did not sit well upon age or the gravity of his profession. Upon one feature, indeed, Dr. Parr valued himself exceedingly; this was his eye. He fancied that it was peculiarly searching and significant: he conceited, even, that it frightened people, and had a particular form of words for expressing the severe use of this basilisk function: "I inflected my eye upon him," was his phrase in such cases.<sup>1</sup> But the thing was all a mistake; his eye could be borne very well; there was no mischief in it. Doubtless, when a nervous gentleman in a pulpit, who was generally the subject of these inflictions, saw a comical-looking old man from below levelling one eye at him, with as knowing an expression as he could throw into it, mere perplexity as to the motive and proper construction of so unseasonable a personality might flutter his spirits, and, to the vain, misjudging operator below, might distort this equivocal confusion, arising out of blank ignorance of his meaning, into the language of a conscious and confessing culprit. Explanations would be of rare occurrence; for some would not condescend to complain; and others would feel that the insult, unless it was for the intention, had scarcely body enough and tangible shape to challenge inquiry. To remonstrate would only be to let Dr Parr know that he had succeeded in lodging an affront, and also to give him an opportunity for redoubling it. They would anticipate that the same man who, in so solemn a situation as that between a congregation and their pastor, could offer such an affront, would be apt to throw a fresh ridicule upon the complaint itself, by saying—"Fix my eye upon you, did I? Why, that's all my eye with a vengeance. Look at you, did I? Well, sir, a cat may look at a king." Thus said in a tone of sneer; and then, with sneer and strut at once, "I trust, sir—humbly, I take leave to suppose, sir—that Dr Parr is not so obscure a person, not so wholly unknown in this sublunary world, but he may have licence to look even at as great a man as the Reverend Mr. So-and-so." And thus the worthy Doctor would be confirmed in his mistake that he carried about with him, in his very homely collection of features, an organ of singular power and effect for detecting hidden guilt.

<sup>1</sup> In a letter of Southey's to his brother, Lieutenant Southey, of date Keswick, Nov 12, 1808, he wrote—"Little Mr De Quincey is at Grasmere. He was here last week, and is coming again. I wish he was not so little, and I wish he would not leave his greatcoat always behind him upon the road. But he is a very able man, with a head brimful of information." At the date of that letter De Quincey was but twenty-three years of age. But the same impression of his extremely diminutive appearance accompanied him through life, until, the compensating boyish bloom of his face in his earlier years having given way to seams and wrinkles under the wear and tear of his later, he struck every one as "a little druid wight of withered aspect."—M.

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

A mistake, at all events, it was; and his biographers have gone into it as largely under the delusions of friendship as he under the delusions of vanity. On this, therefore, I ground what seems a fair inference—that, in matters so plain and palpable as the character of a man's person and the cast of his features it has been possible for his friends to fall into gross errors and exaggerations, much more may we count upon such fallacies of appreciation in dealing with the subtler qualities of his intellect, and his less determinable pretensions as a scholar. Hence I have noticed these lower and trivial misrepresentations as presumptions for suspecting more weighty instances of the same exaggerating spirit. The animus which prompted so unserviceable a falsification of the real case is not likely to have hesitated when coming upon ground more important to Dr Parr's reputation, and, at the same time, much more susceptible of a sincere latitude of appraisement, even amongst the neutral. I call the whole estimates to a new audit, and submit the claims of Dr. Parr to a more equitable tribunal. I would anticipate the award of posterity; and it is no fault of mine that, in doing so, it will be necessary to hand the Doctor down from that throne in the cathedral of English clerical merit, on which the intemperate zeal of his friends has seated him for the moment, into some humble prebendal stall. Far more agreeable it would naturally have been to assist in raising a man unjustly depreciated than to undertake an office generally so ungracious as that of repressing the presumptuous enthusiasm of partisans, where it may seem to have come forward, with whatever exaggerations, yet still in a service of disinterested friendship, and on behalf of a man who, after all, was undeniably learned. The disinterestedness, however, of that admiration which has gathered about Dr. Parr is not so genuine as it may appear. His biographers (be it recollected) are bigots, who serve their superstition in varnishing their idol; they are Whigs, who lose no opportunity of undervaluing Tories, they are religious Dissenters, who value their theme quite as much for the collateral purpose which it favours of attacking the Church of England as for its direct and avowed one of lauding Dr. Parr. Moreover, in the letters (which, in the undigested chaos of Dr. Johnstone's collection, form three volumes out of eight<sup>1</sup>), Dr. Parr himself obtains a mischievous power, which, in a more regular form of composition, he would not have possessed, and which, as an honest man, we must presume that he would not have desired. Letters addressed to private correspondents, and only by accident reaching the press, have all the licence of private conversation. Most of us, perhaps, send a little treason or so at odd times through the post-office. In all this there is no blame. Hanc veniam petimusque damusque vicissim. Such an indulgence we claim for ourselves, and allow to our antagonists: we give and we take interchangeably. But publication is another thing. Rash insinuations, judgments of ultra violence, injurious anecdotes of loose or no authority, and paradoxes sportively maintained in the certainty of a benignant construction on the part of the individual correspondent—all these, when printed, become armed, according to circumstances of time and person, with the power of extensive mischief. It is undeniable that through Dr. Parr's published letters are scattered some scores of passages which, had he been alive, or had they been brought forward in a formal address to the public, would have called forth indignant replies of vehement expostulation or blank contemptuous contradiction. And many even of his more general comments on political affairs, or on the events and characters of his times, would have been overlooked only upon the consideration that the place which he occupied, in life or in literature, was not such as to aid him in giving effect to his opinions.

<sup>1</sup> The Works of Samuel Parr, LL.D. with Memoirs of his Life and Writings and a Selection from his Correspondence, by John Johnstone, M.D., 8 vols, London, 1828.—M

In many of these cases, as we have said already, the writer had a title to allowance which those who publish his letters have not. But there are other cases which call for as little indulgence to him as to them. In some of his political intemperances, he may be considered as under a twofold privilege: first, of place—since, as a private letter-writer, writing in his study things meant to be read in his correspondent's drawing-room, he must be held as within the protection and the licence of his own fireside; secondly, of time—since, on a general rule of construction, it may be assumed that such communications are not deliberate, but thrown off on the spur of the occasion; that they express, therefore, not a man's settled and abiding convictions, but the first momentary impulses of his passion or his humour. But in many of his malicious sarcasms and disparaging judgments upon contemporaries who might be regarded as competitors with himself, either for the prizes of clerical life or for public estimation, Dr. Parr could take no benefit by this liberal construction. The sentiments he avowed in many cases of this description were not in any respect hasty or unpremeditated ebullitions of a momentary impulse. This is evident; because uniformly, and as often almost as he either spoke or wrote upon the persons in question, he gave vent to the same bilious jealousy in sneers or libels of one uniform character ; and, if he forbore to do this in his open and avowed publications, the fair inference is that his fears or his interest restrained him ; since it is notorious, from the general evidence of his letters and his conversation, that none of those whom he viewed with these jealous feelings could believe that they owed anything by possibility to his courtesy or his moderation.

For example, and just to illustrate my meaning, in what terms did he speak and write of the very eminent Dean of Carlisle, the late Dr. Isaac Milner ? How did he treat Bishop Herbert Marsh ? How, again, the illustrious Bishop Horsley ?<sup>1</sup> All of them, I answer, with unprovoked scurrility. Not one had offered him any slight or offence, all were persons of gentlemanly bearing, though the last (it is true) had shown some rough play to one of Parr's pet heresiarchs ; all of them were entitled to his respect by attainments in various directions superior to his own, and all of them were more favourably known to the world than himself, by useful contributions to science or theologic learning. Dean Milner had ruined his own activities by eating opium ; and he is known, I believe, by little more than his continuation down to the Lutheran period of that Ecclesiastical History which had been originally undertaken by his brother Joseph,<sup>2</sup> and by the papers which he contributed to the London Philosophical Transactions. But his researches and his accomplishments were of wonderful extent ; and his conversation is still remembered by multitudes for its remarkable compass, and its almost Burkian quality of elastic accommodation to the fluctuating accidents of the occasion,<sup>3</sup> so that his contributions were not drawn from recollections of past studies that fitted in by accident to an alien call, but were felt to be a natural and spontaneous growth under the inspirations of the moment. The dean was not much in the world's eye : at intervals, indeed, he was to be found at the tables of the great ; more often he sought his ease and consolations in his honourable academic retreat, as the head of Queen's College, Cambridge. There he was the object of dislike to a particular intriguing clique that had the ear of Dr. Parr. He was also obnoxious to the great majority of mere worldlings, as one of those zealous Christians who are usually denominated evangelical, that is to say, in common with the Wilberforces, Thorntons, Hoares, Babingtons, Gisbornes, &c, and many thousands of less distinguished persons in and out of Parliament, Dean Milner assigned a peculiar emphasis, and a more significant interpretation, to those doctrines of original sin, the terms upon which redemption is offered,—to regeneration, sanctification, &c.,—which have the appearance of being the characteristic parts in the Christian economy. Whether otherwise wrong or right in these views, it strikes us poor lay critics (who pretend to no authoritative knowledge on these great mysteries) that those who adopt them have at all events a primâ facie title to be considered less worldly, and more spiritual-minded, than the mass of mankind, and such a frame of mind is at least an argument of fitness for religious contemplations, in so far as temper is concerned, be the doctrinal (or merely intellectual) errors what they may. Consequently, for our own parts, humbly sensible as we are of our deficiencies in this great science of Christian philosophy, we could never at any time join in the unthinking ridicule which is scattered by the brilliant and the dull upon these peculiarities. Wheresoever, and whensoever, we must freely avow that evidences of real nonconformity to the spirit of this impure earth of ours command our unfeigned respect. But that was a thing which the worthy Dr. Parr could not abide. He loved no high or aerial standards in morals or in religion. Visionaries, who encouraged such notions, he viewed (to express it by a learned word) as ἀεροβατούντας, and as fit subjects for the chastisement of the secular arm. In fact, he would have persecuted a little upon such a provocation. On Mr. Pitt and the rest who joined in suspending the Habeas Corpus Act Dr. Parr was wont to ejaculate his pastoral benediction in the following after-dinner toast—“Qui suspenderit, suspendantur!” And afterwards, upon occasion of the six bills provoked by the tumults at Manchester, Glasgow, &c., his fatherly blessing was daily uttered in this little caressing sentiment—"Bills for the throats of those who framed the bills!" On the same principle, he would have prayed fervently—had any Isaac Milner infested his parish—"Let those who would exalt our ideals of Christianity be speedily themselves exalted!" And, therefore, if any man inquires upon what grounds it was that Dr. Parr hated with an intolerant hatred—scorned, and sharpened his gift of sneer upon—the late Dean of Carlisle, I have here told him "the reason why"; and reason enough, I think, in all conscience. For be it known that, over and above other weighty and obvious arguments for such views, Dr. Parr had a standing personal irritation connected with this subject—a continual "thorn in the flesh"—in the relations subsisting between himself and his principal, the incumbent of his own favourite and adopted parish. As the position of the parties was amusing to those who were in possession of the key to the right understanding of it—viz a knowledge of their several views and opinions—I will pause a moment to describe the circumstances of the case.

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Isaac Milner, 1751-1820 ; Bishop Herbert Marsh, 1758-1839 ; Bishop Samuel Horsley, 1733-1806.—M.

<sup>2</sup> History of the Church of Christ, by Joseph Milner, 5 vols, 1794. Additions by Isaac Milner, 1819 —M.

<sup>3</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page —M.

Dr. Parr, it is well known, spent a long period of his latter life at Hatton, a village in Warwickshire. The living of Hatton belonged to Dr. Bridges, who, many a long year ago, was well known in Oxford as one of the fellows in the magnificently-endowed College of Magdalen, that is to say, Dr. Bridges was the incumbent at the time when some accident of church preferment brought Dr. Parr into that neighbourhood. By an arrangement which I do not exactly understand, the two doctors, for their mutual convenience, exchanged parishes. I find it asserted by Dr. Johnstone that on Dr. Parr's side the exchange originated in a spirit of obliging accommodation. It may be so. although the word accommodation, which forced itself slowly upon the hazy intellect of Shakspeare's Bardolph as "that by which a man is, or may be thought to be, accommodated," does not certainly appear to have ever found a place in the practical vocabulary of Dr. Parr. However, one pointed reservation was made by Dr. Bridges (whether in obedience to church discipline or to his private scruples of conscience, I cannot say) viz. that once in every year (according to my remembrance, for a series of six consecutive Sundays) he should undertake the pulpit duties of the church. On this scheme the two learned clerks built their alterna federa regni<sup>1</sup>, and, like two buckets, the Drs Bridges and Parr went up and down reciprocally for a long succession of years. The waters, however, which they brought up to the lips of their parishioners were drawn from two different wells, for Dr. Bridges shared in the heresy of the Dean of Carlisle. Hence a system of energetic (on Dr. Parr's side, we may say of fierce) mutual counteraction. Each, during his own reign, laboured to efface all impressions left by his rival. On Dr. Bridges's part, this was probably, in some measure, a necessity of conscience; for he looked upon his flock as ruined in spiritual health by the neglect and ignorance of their pastor. On Dr. Parr's, it was the mere bigotry of hatred, such as all schemes of teaching are fitted to provoke which appeal to a standard of ultra-perfection, or exact any peculiar sanctity of life. Were Bridges right, in that case, it was clear that Parr was wrong by vital defect. But, on the other hand, were Parr right, then Bridges was wrong only by superfluity and pardonable redundancy. Such was the position, such the mutual aspects, of the two doctors. Parr's wrath waxed hotter and hotter. Had Dr. Bridges happened to be a vulgar sectarian, of narrow education, of low breeding, and without distinguished connexions,—those etesian gales or annual monsoons which brought in his periodical scourge would have been hailed by Parr as the harbingers of a triumph in reversion. Yielding the pulpit to his rival for a few Sundays, he would have relied upon the taste of his parishioners for making the proper distinctions. He would have said—"You have all eyes and ears—you all know that fellow; you all know me: need I say more? Pray, don't kick him when he comes again." But in the present case this sort of contempt was out of the question. Dr. Bridges was a man of fortune; travelled and accomplished; familiar with courts and the manners of courts. Even that intercourse with people of rank and fashion which Parr so much cultivated in his latter years, and which, to his own conceit, placed him so much in advance of his own order, gave him no advantage over Dr Bridges. True, the worthy fanatic (as some people called him) had planted himself in a house at Clifton near Bristol, and spent all his days in running up and down the lanes and alleys of that great city, carrying Christian instruction to the dens of squalid poverty, and raising the torch of spiritual light upon the lairs of dissolute wretchedness. But, in other respects, he was a man comme il faut. However his mornings might be spent, his souvées were elegant, and it was not an impossible event to meet a prince or an ambassador at his parties. Hence it became vexatiously difficult to treat him as a person of no social consideration. In that view he was the better man of the two. And Parr's revenge, year after year, was baulked of its food. In this dilemma of impotent rage, what he could he did! And the scene was truly whimsical. Regularly as Dr. Bridges approached, Dr Parr fled the country. As the wheels of Dr. Bridges were heard muttering menacingly in advance, Dr Parr's wheels were heard groaning sullenly in retreat. And, when the season of this annual affliction drew to a close, when the wrath of Providence was spent, and the church of Hatton passed from under the shadows of eclipse into renovated light, then did Dr Parr—cautiously putting out his feelers to make sure of the enemy's retreat—resume the spiritual sceptre. He congratulated his parish of Hatton that their trials were over; he performed classical lustrations, and Pagan rites of expiation; he circled the churchyard nine times withershins (or inverting the course of the sun), he fumigated the whole precincts of Hatton Church with shag tobacco, and left no stone unturned to cleanse his little Warwickshire fold from its piacular pollution.

<sup>1</sup> Their compact of alternate sovereignty

This anecdote illustrates Dr. Parr's temper. Mark, reader, his self-contradiction. He hated what he often called "rampant orthodoxy," and was never weary of running down those churchmen who thought it their duty to strengthen the gates of the English Church against Popish superstitions (or what they viewed as such), on the one hand, or against Socinianism on the other. Yet, let anything start up in the shape of zealous and fervid devotion—right or wrong—and let it threaten to displace his own lifeless scheme of ethics, or to give a shock of galvanism to his weekly paralytic exhortations ; let but a scintillation appear of opposition in that shape, and who so ready to persecute as Dr. Parr ? Fanaticism, he would tell us, was what he could not bear—the rights of the Church must be supported with rigour, if needful, even with severity. He was also a great patron of the Church as against laymen, of the parson as against the churchwarden ; of the rector's right to graze his horse upon the graves ; of the awful obligation upon his conscience to allow of no damned or ill-washed surplice, of the solemn responsibility which he had undertaken in the face of his country to suffer no bell-ringing except in canonical hours ; to enforce the decalogue, and also the rubric ; to obey his ecclesiastical superiors within the hours of divine service, and, finally, to read all proclamations or other state documents sent to him by authority with the most dutiful submission, simply reserving to himself the right of making them as ridiculous as possible by his emphasis and cadence. In this fashion Dr. Parr manifested his reverence for the Church Establishment ; and for these great objects it seemed to him lawful to persecute.<sup>1</sup> But, as to purity of doctrine, zeal, primitive devotion, the ancient faith as we received it from our fathers, or any service pretending to be more than lip service—for all such questionable matters it was incumbent upon us to show the utmost liberality of indifference on the most modern and showy pattern, and, except for Popery, to rely upon Bishop Hoadly. This explanation was necessary to make the anecdote of Dr Bridges fully intelligible, and that anecdote was necessary to explain the many scornful allusions to that reverend gentleman which the reader will find in Dr Johnstone's collection of letters ; but, above all, it was necessary for the purpose of putting him in possession of Dr. Parr's character and position as a member of the Church of England.

To return from this digression into the track of our speculations : Dean Milner and Dr. Bridges stood upon the same ground in Dr Parr's displeasure. Their offence was the same, their criminality perhaps equal ; and it was obviously of a kind that, for example's sake, ought not to be overlooked. But Herbert Marsh was not implicated in their atrocities. No charge of that nature was ever preferred against him. His merits were of a different order, and,—confining my remarks to his original merit, and that which perhaps exclusively drew upon him the notice of Mr. Pitt's government,—not so strictly clerical. His earliest public service was his elaborate account of the regal conferences at Pilnitz, and his consequent justification of this country in the eyes of Europe on the question, then pending between her and the French Republic; with which party lay the onus of first virtual aggression, and with which therefore, by implication, the responsibility for that deluge of blood and carnage which followed.<sup>1</sup> This service Herbert Marsh performed in a manner to efface the remembrance of all former attempts. His next service was more in the character of his profession: he introduced his country to the very original labours in theology of Michaelis, and he expanded the compass and value of these labours by his own exertions.<sup>2</sup> Patriots, men even with the feeblest sense of patriotism, have felt grateful to Dr. Marsh for having exonerated England from the guilt of creating a state of war lightly—upon a weak motive—upon an unconsidered motive—or indeed upon any motive or reason whatsoever; for a reason supposes choice and election of the judgment, and choice there can be none without an acknowledged alternative. Now it was the triumphant result of Dr. Marsh's labours that alternative there was practically none, under the actual circumstances, for Great Britain; and that war was the mere injunction of a flagrant necessity, coupling the insults and the menaces of France with what are now known to have been the designs, and indeed the momentary interests, of the predominant factions at that epoch. Herbert Marsh has satisfied everybody almost but the bigots (if any now survive) of Jacobinism as it raged in 1792 and 1793, when it held its horrid Sabbaths over the altar and the throne, and deluged the scaffolds with innocent blood. All but those he has satisfied. Has he satisfied Dr. Parr? No. For those who governed his fluctuating conscience were the parliamentary leaders from whom he expected a bishopric (and would very possibly have got it, had some of them lived a little longer in the first decade of this century, or he himself lived to the end of the third).<sup>1</sup> Hence it does not much surprise me that, in spite of his natural and creditable horror on the judicial murder of the French king, he relapsed into Jacobinism so fierce that two years after a friend, by way of agreeable flattery, compliments him as being only "half a sansculotte", a compliment, however, which he doubtless founded more upon his confidence in Dr Parr's original goodness of heart, and the almost inevitable contagion of English society, than upon any warrant which the Doctor had yet given him by words or by acts for so advantageous an opinion. Well, therefore, might Herbert Marsh displease Dr Parr. He was the open antagonist of those through whom only the fortunes of sansculottes, thorough-bred or half-bred, had any chance of thriving, and he had exposed the hollowness of that cause to which the Doctor was in a measure sold.

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

<sup>1</sup> History of the Politics of Great Britain and France from the time of the Conference at Pilnitz to the Declaration of War against Great Britain. 2 vols. 1800.—M.

<sup>2</sup> Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, translated from the German, with notes, etc. 6 vols. 1793-1801.—M.

As to Horsley, his whole life, as a man of letters and a politician, must have won him the acceptable tribute of Dr. Parr's fear and hatred; a tribute which Dr. Parr paid as duly as his assessed taxes. Publicly, indeed, he durst not touch him; for the horrid scourge which Horsley had wielded at one time, in questions of scholarship and orthodoxy, still resounded in his ears. But in his letters and conversation Dr. Parr fretted for ever at his eminence, and eyed him grudgingly and malignly; and those among his correspondents who were not too generous and noble-minded to pay their court through his weaknesses evidently were aware that a sneer at Bishop Horsley was as welcome as a basket of game. Sneers, indeed, were not the worst there are to be found in Dr. Parr's correspondence some dark insinuations, apparently pointed at Horsley, which involve a sort of charges that should never be thrown out against any man without the accompaniment of positive attestations. What may have been the tenor of that bishop's life and conversation I do not take upon myself to say. It is little probable, at this time of day, under the censorious vigilance of so many unfriendly eyes, and in a nation where even the persons upon the judicial bench exhibit in their private lives almost a sanctity of deportment, that a dignitary of the English Church will err by any scandalous immorality. Be that, however, as it may, and confining our view to Horsley in his literary character, I must say that he is far beyond the reach of Dr Parr's hostility. As a polemic and a champion of his own Church, he was above the competition of any contemporary divine. As a theologian, he reconciles the nearly contradictory merits of novelty and originality with well-meditated orthodoxy, and I may venture to assert that his Sermons produced a greater impression than any English book of pure divinity for the last century.<sup>1</sup> In saying this, I do not speak of the sale, what that might be I know not; I speak of the strength of the impression diffused through the upper circles, as apparent in the reverential terms which, after the appearance of that work, universally marked the sense of cultivated men in speaking of Bishop Horsley—even of those who had previously viewed him with some dislike in his character of controversialist. Let the two men be compared; not the veriest bigot amongst the Dissenters, however much he would naturally prefer as a companion, or as a subject for eulogy, that man who betrayed the interests of his own Church to him who was its column of support and ornament, could have the hardihood to insinuate that Dr. Horsley was properly, or becomingly, a mark for the scurrilities of Dr. Parr. In what falls within the peculiar province of a schoolmaster, I think it probable (to make every allowance which candour demands) that Dr Parr had that superior accuracy which is maintained by the practice of teaching. But in reach and compass of intellect in those mixed branches of speculative research which belong equally to divinity and to metaphysics (as in the Platonic philosophy), in philosophic scholarship, and generally in vigour of style and thought, I suppose Horsley to have had, in the eyes of the public no less than in the realities of the case, so prodigiously the advantage that none but a sycophant or a false friend would think of suggesting seriously a comparison so disadvantageous to Dr. Parr. But, at all events, let the relations of merit be what they may in Horsley, certainly his absolute merit is unquestionable; and the continued insults of Dr. Parr are insufferable.

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

<sup>1</sup> His Sermons were published in 1810-1822 in four volumes, and again in 1829 in two volumes.—M.

Upon these justifying grounds—viz. special attacks past counting, besides a general system of disparagement and contumely towards the most distinguished pretensions in Church and State, unless ranged on the side of the Whigs—I stand for a sufficient apology in pressing the matter strongly against Dr. Parr.<sup>1</sup> Not Tories only, but all who resist anarchists (for that Dr. Parr did not blazon himself in that character was due to the lucky accident which saved him from all opportunities of acting upon his crazy speculations), have an interest in depressing to their proper level those who make a handle of literature for insidious party purposes, polluting its amenities with the angry passions proper to our civil dissensions, and abusing the good-nature with which we Tories are always ready to welcome literary merit without consideration of politics. In order to appraise Dr. Parr satisfactorily, let us pursue him through his three characters, the triple role which he supported in life—first, of Whig politician; secondly, of scholar (or, expressing our meaning in its widest extent, of literary man); and, finally, of theologian.

There are, in every populous community, many different strata of society, that lie in darkness, as it were, to each other, from mere defect of mutual intercourse; and in the literary world there are many chambers that have absolutely no intercommunication. Afterwards, when thirty or sixty years have passed away—by means of posthumous memoirs, letters, anecdotes, and other literary monuments—they are all brought, in a manner, face to face; and we, their posterity, first see them as making up a whole, of which they themselves were imperfectly conscious. Every year makes further disclosures, and thus a paradox is realised, that the more we are removed from personal connexion with a past age of literature oftentimes the better we know it.

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

Meantime, as an appropriate close to this preliminary section, I will put a question—and in a cursory way discuss the proper answer to it—upon Dr. Parr, as a man of the world, and ambitious candidate for worldly distinctions; in short, as the architect of his fortunes. Was he, in this light, an able and successful man? Or, separating the two parts of that question, which do not always proceed concurrently, if he were not successful in a degree corresponding to his own wishes and the expectations of his friends,—if it is notorious that he missed of attaining those prizes which he never hesitated to avow as the objects that stimulated his ambition,—in what degree are we to ascribe his failure to want of talent, to misdirection of his talent, to a scrupulous and fastidious integrity, to the injustice of his superiors, or, finally, to mere accidents of ill luck? One man in each ten thousand comes into this world, according to the homely saying, “with a silver spoon in his mouth”; but most men have a fortune to make, a station to create. Taking life as a whole, luck has but little sway in controlling its arrangements. Good sense and perseverance, prudence and energy, these are the fatal deities that domineer over the stars and their aspects. And, when an ambitious man’s coffin knocks at the gates of the tomb, it is a question not unimportant, among other and greater questions, What was he on beginning life—what is he now? What has been his success in playing for the great stakes of his profession or his trade? By his own confession, often and most frankly repeated, Dr. Parr was an ambitious man on the vulgarest scheme. what, then, in his case, will be the answer to these questions?

The prizes which the Doctor set before his eyes from his earliest days were not very lofty, but they were laudable; and he avowed them with a navvété that was amusing. They were two—a mitre and a coach-and-four. “I am not accustomed,” says he (writing to an Irish bishop), “to dissemble the wishes I once had” (this was said in 1807, when he had them more than ever) “of arriving at the profits and splendour of the prelacy, or the claims to them which I believe myself to possess.” The bishopric he did not get; there he failed. For the coach-and-four he was more fortunate. At the very latest period of his life, when the shades of death were fast gathering about him, he found himself able to indulge in this luxury ; and, as his time was obviously short, he wisely resolved to make the most of it ; and, upon any or no excuse, the Doctor was to be seen flying over the land at full gallop, and scouring town and country with four clerical-looking long-tailed horses. We believe he even meditated a medal, commemorating his first ovation by a faithful portrait of the coach and his own episcopal wig in their meridian pomp. He might have been represented in the act of looking out of the window, and "inflicting his eye" upon some hostile parson picking his way through the mud on foot. On the whole, I really rejoice that the Doctor got his coach and his four resounding coursers. The occasional crack of the whip must have sounded pleasantly in his ears at a period when he himself had ceased to operate with that weapon—when he was no more than an emeritus professor—and could be saluted no longer as Samuel μαστιγοφόρος.<sup>1</sup> So far was well, but still, I ask, how came it that his coach panels wanted their appropriate heraldic decoration ? How was it that he missed the mitre ? Late in life, I find him characterising himself as an "unpreferred, calumniated, half-starving country parson", no part of which, indeed, was true ; but yet I demand—how was it that any colourable plea existed, at that time of his career, to give one moment's plausibility to such an exaggeration ? Let us consider.

Dr Parr was the son of a country practitioner in the humbler departments of medicine. Parr senior practised as a surgeon, apothecary, and accoucheur. From him, therefore, his son could expect little assistance in his views of personal aggrandisement. But that was not necessary. An excellent Latin scholar, and a man who brought the rare sanction (sanctification, I was going to say) of clerical countenance to so graceless a party as the Whigs, who in those days had scarcely a professional friend to say grace at their symposia, must, with any reasonable discretion in the conduct of his life, have been by much too valuable a resource on the Whig establishment to run any risk of neglect. The single clerk, the one sole reverend man of letters, who was borne upon their books, must have had a priceless value in the eyes of that faction, when "taking stock," and estimating their alliances. To them he must have been what the Emperor of Morocco is to the collector of butterflies. To have lost this value, to have forfeited his hold upon their gratitude, and actually to have depreciated as he grew older and better known to the world, implies too significantly some gross misconduct, or some rueful indiscretions. The truth is this—and for Parr's own honour, lest worse things should be thought of him than the case really warrants, his friends ought to make it known—though a man of integrity, he could not be relied upon, in a muster of forces, he was one of the few that never could be absolutely reckoned on and made sure of. Neither did his scruples obey any known law, he could swallow a camel, and strain at a gnat, and his caprice was of the most dangerous kind,—not a woman's caprice, which is the mere mantling of levity, and readily enough obeys any fresh impulse, which it is often easy to apply in an opposite direction. Dr. Parr's caprices grew upon another stock; they were the fitful outbreaks of steady, mulish wrong-headedness; products of a blind belief that, in order to show his independence now and then, like a true mule, he must lie down with his burden at some critical point of the road, and refuse to budge an inch farther. This was a constitutional taint, for which he was indebted to the accoucheur. That original old mule overruled his son to the end of his long life, and controlled his reiterated opportunities of a certain and brilliant success, by the hereditary taint in the blood which he transmitted to him, in more perhaps than its original strength. The true name for this infirmity is, in the vulgar dialect, pig-headedness. Stupid imperturbable adherence, deaf and blind, to some perverse view that abruptly thwarted and counteracted his party, making his friends stare, and his opponents laugh—that was the key to Dr. Parr's lingering preferment. And I believe, upon a considerate view of his whole course, that he threw away ten times the amount of fortune, rank, splendour, and influence that he ever obtained, and with no countervailing indemnity from any moral reputation, such as would have attended all consistent sacrifices to high-minded principle,—on the contrary, with harsh opposition and expressions of powerful disgust from friends in every quarter, all conscious that, in such instances of singularity, Dr. Parr was merely obeying a demon, that now and then mastered him, of wayward, restive, moody self-conceit, or else the blind spirit of contradiction. Most of us know a little of such men, and occasionally suffer by such men in the private affairs of life—men that are unusually jealous of slights, or insufficient acknowledgments of their personal claims and consequence. They require to be courted, petted, caressed; they refuse to be compromised or committed by the general acts of their party; they must be specially consulted, else they read a lesson to the whole party on their error, by some shocking and revolting act of sudden desertion, which, from a person of different character, would have been received as perfidy. Dr Johnstone himself admits that Parr was “jealous of attention and indignant at neglect,” and on one occasion endeavours to explain a transaction of his life by supposing that he may have been “hurried away by one of those torrents of passion of which there are too many instances in his life.” Of the father, Parr obstetrical, the same indulgent biographer remarks that he was “distinguished by the rectitude of his principles”; and in another place he pronounces him, in summing up his character, to have been “an honest, well-meaning Tory,” but, at the same time, confesses him to have been “the petty tyrant of his fireside,”—an amiable little feature of character that would go far to convince his own family that “rectitude of principles” was not altogether incompatible with the practice of a ruffian.

<sup>1</sup> The scourge-bearer. this is the epithet applied to the lunatic Telamonian Ajax by Sophocles.

Tory, however, Parr senior was not he was a Jacobite, probably for the gratification of his spleen, and upon a conceit that this arrayed him in a distinct personal contest with the House of Hanover; whereas, once confounded amongst the prevailing party of friends to that interest, as a man-midwife, he could hardly hope to win the notice of His Britannic Majesty. His faction, however, being beaten to their heart's content, and his own fortune all going overboard in the storm, he suddenly made a bolt to the very opposite party—he ratted to the red-hot Whigs; and the circumstances of the case, which are as we have here stated them, hardly warrant us in putting a very favourable construction upon his motives. As was the father, such was the son : the same right of rebellion reserved to himself, whether otherwise professing himself Jacobite or Whig ; the same peremptory duty of passive obedience for those of his household ; the same hot intemperances in politics ; the same disdain of accountability to his party leaders, and, finally, the same "petty tyranny of the fireside." This last is a point on which all the biographers are agreed they all record the uncontrollable ill temper and hasty violence of Dr Parr within his domestic circle. And one anecdote, illustrating his intemperance, I can furnish myself. On one occasion, rising up from table, in the middle of a fierce discussion with Mrs. Parr, he took a carving-knife, and, applying it to a portrait of that lady, hanging upon the wall, he drew it sharply across the jugular, and cut the throat of the picture from ear to ear, thus murdering her in effigy.

This view of Parr's intractable temper is necessary to understand his life, and in some measure to justify his friends. Though not (as he chose himself to express it, under a momentary sense of his slow progress in life, and the reluctant blossoming of his preferment) "a half-starved parson," yet most unquestionably he reaped nothing at all from his long attachment to Whiggery, by comparison with what he would have reaped had that attachment been more cordial and unbroken, and had he, in other respects, borne himself with more discretion, and, above all, had he abstained from offensive personalities. This was a rock on which Parr often wrecked himself. Things, and principles, and existing establishments, might all have been attacked with even more virulence than he exhibited, had his furious passions allowed him to keep his hands off the persons of individuals. Here lay one class of the causes which retarded his promotion. Another was his unbecoming warfare upon his own Church. "I am sorry," said one of his earliest, latest, and wisest friends (Bishop Bennet)—"I am sorry you attack the Church, for fear of consequences to your own advancement." This was said in 1792. Six years later, Bennet, who had a confidential post in the Irish Government, and saw the dreadful crisis to which things were hurrying—viz. at a moment when two formidable insurrections were impending—found it necessary to break off all intercourse with Dr. Parr; so shocking to a man of principle was the careless levity with which this minister of peace and his immediate associates, themselves in the bosom of security amongst the woods of Warwickshire, scattered their firebrands of inflammatory language through the public at a period of so much awful irritation. Afterwards, it is true, when the Irish crisis had passed, and the rebellion was suppressed, Bennet's respect for Parr as a scholar led him to resume his correspondence. But he never altered his opinion of Parr as a politician: he viewed him as a man profoundly ignorant in politics, a mere Parson Adams in the knowledge of affairs and the real springs of political action or political influence; but unfortunately with all the bigotry and violent irritability that belong to the most excited and interested partisan, having the headlong passions of a mob united with the ignorance of the desert, coupling the timid simplicity of the dove with the fierce instincts of the serpent.

The events of his life moved under this unhappy influence. Leaving college prematurely upon the misfortune of his father's death,<sup>1</sup> he became an assistant at Harrow under the learned Dr. Sumner. About five years after, on Dr. Sumner's death, though manifestly too young for the situation, he entered into a warm contest for the vacant place of head-master. Notwithstanding the support of Lord Dartmouth and others, he lost it; and, unfortunately for his peace of mind, though fancying, as usual, all sorts of intrigues against himself, yet in the real circumstances of the election he was not able to detect one argument of injustice. The pretensions of Benjamin Heath, his successful competitor, were such as to disabuse all the world of any delusive conceit that justice had not been done. Parr, it must be remembered, then only twenty-five years old, had in no single instance distinguished himself; nor had he even fifty years after—no, nor at the day of his death—given any evidences to the world that he was comparable to Heath as a Grecian. The probable ground of Heath's success was a character better fitted to preside over a great school (for even the too friendly biographers of Parr admit that he did not command the respect of the boys), and his better established learning. Naturally enough, Parr was unwilling to admit these causes, so advantageous to his rival, as the true ones. What, then, is his account of the matter? He says that he lost the election by a vote which he had given to John Wilkes in his contest for Middlesex. To John Wilkes—mark that, reader! Thus early had this “gowned student” engaged his passions and his services in the interest of brawling, intriguing faction.

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

This plan failing, he set up a rival establishment in the neighbourhood of Harrow, at Stanmore; and never, certainly, did so young a man, with so few of the ordinary guarantees to offer—that is to say, either property, experience, or connexions—meet with such generous assistance. One friend lent him £2000 at two per cent, though his security must obviously have been merely personal. Another lent him £200 without any interest at all. And many persons of station and influence, amongst whom was Lord Dartmouth, gave him a sort of countenance equally useful to his interests by placing their sons under his care. All came to nothing, however; the establishment was knocked up, and clearly from gross defects of management. And, had his principal creditor pressed for repayment, or had he shown less than the most generous forbearance, which he continued through twenty-one years (in fact, until the repayment was accomplished without distress), Parr must have been ruined, for in those days there was no merciful indulgence of the laws to hopeless insolvents; unless by the favour of their creditors, they were doomed to rot in prison. Now, in this one story we have two facts illustrated, bearing upon our present inquiry: first, the extraordinary good luck of Parr; secondly, his extraordinary skill in neutralising or abusing it.

What young man, that happens to be penniless at the age of twenty-five, untried in the management of money, untried even as the presiding master in a school, would be likely to find a friend willing to intrust him, on his personal responsibility (and with no prospect for the recovery of his money, except through the tardy and uncertain accumulation of profits upon an opposition school), with so large a sum as £2000? Who, in an ordinary way, could count upon the support of a nobleman enjoying the ear and confidence of royalty? Lastly, who would so speedily defeat and baffle, by his own unassisted negligence and flagrant indiscretions, so much volunteer bounty? At this time of his life, it strikes me, in fact, that Dr. Parr was mad. The students at Stanmore were indulged in all sorts of irregularities. That, perhaps, might arise from the unfortunate situation of the new establishment—too near to its rival; and in part, also, from the delicate position of Parr, who, in most instances, had come under an unfortunate personal obligation to the young gentlemen who followed him from Harrow. But in his habits of dress and deportment, which drew scandal upon himself, and jealousy upon his establishment, Parr owed his ill success to nobody but himself. Mr. Roderick, his assistant, and a most friendly reporter, says that at this time he “brought upon himself the ridicule of the neighbourhood and passengers by many foolish acts; such as riding in high prelatical pomp through the streets on a black saddle, bearing in his hand a long cane or wand, such as women used to have, with an ivory head like a crozier, which was probably the reason why he liked it” We see by this he was already thinking of the bishopric. “At other times he was seen stalking through the town in a dirty striped morning-gown: Nil fuit unquam sic impar sibi.” When we add that Dr. Parr soon disgusted and alienated his weightiest friend amongst the residents at Stanmore—viz Mr. Smith, the accomplished rector of the place—we cannot wonder that little more than five years saw that scheme at an end.<sup>1</sup>

The school at Stanmore he could not be said to leave; it left him: such was his management that no fresh pupils succeeded to those whom the progress of years carried off to the universities. When this wavering rushlight had at length finally expired, it became necessary to think of other plans, and in the spring of 1777 he accepted the mastership of Colchester School. Even there, brief as his connexion was with that establishment, he found time to fasten a quarrel upon the trustees of the school in reference to a lease, and upon this quarrel he printed (though he did not publish) a pamphlet. Sir William Jones, his old school-fellow, to whom, as a lawyer, this pamphlet was submitted, found continual occasion to mark upon the margin such criticisms as these, "too violent—too strong." This was probably the mildest mode of telling Dr. Sam that he was growing libellous<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page —M.

But, luckily, he was soon called away from these miserable feuds to a more creditable sort of activity. In the summer of 1778 the mastership of the public Grammar School at Norwich became vacant: in the autumn Parr was elected, and in the beginning of 1779 he commenced his residence in that city. Thus we see that he was unusually befriended in all his undertakings. As a private speculator at Stanmore, as a candidate for Colchester, as a candidate for Norwich, he was uniformly successful, as far as it is possible that encouragement the most liberal, on the part of others, can overrule a man's own imprudence. The mastership of Norwich has certainly been considered a valuable prize by others. How it happened that Parr found it otherwise, or whether mere restlessness and love of change were his governing impulses, does not appear; but it is certain that in August 1785 he sent in his resignation, and at Easter 1786 he went to reside at the parsonage house of Hatton, in the County of Warwick, where he opened a private academy. And, though, as old age advanced, he resigned his pupils, Hatton continued to be his place of residence.

This, then, was the haven, the perpetual curacy of Hatton, into which Dr. Parr steered his little boat, when he had already passed the meridian of his life.<sup>2</sup> And (except upon a visit) he never again left it for any more elevated abode. For a philosopher, we grant that a much happier situation cannot be imagined than that of an English

<sup>1</sup> See Appended Note last cited.—M.

<sup>2</sup> By meridian I here mean the month which exactly bisected his life. Dr. Parr lived about eleven months less than eighty years; and he was about two months more than forty when he came to live at Hatton.

rural parson, rich enough to maintain a good library. Dr Parr was exactly in those circumstances : but Dr Parr was no philosopher. And assuredly this was not the vision which floated before his eyes at Stanmore when he was riding on his "black saddle," in prelatical pomp, with his ivory crosier in his fist. The coach-and-four and mitred panels must then have flourished in the foreground of the picture. But at that time he was between twenty-five and thirty ; now he was turned forty—an age when, if a man should not have made his fortune, at least he ought to see clearly before him the road by which it is to be made. Now, what was Parr's condition at this time, in respect to that supreme object of his exertions ? We have no letter on that point in this year, 1786 ; but we have one in 1782, when it does not appear possible that his situation was materially different. Writing to a man whom he valued, but then under a cloud of distress, and perhaps wishing to excuse himself for not sending him money, he thus states the result of his labours up to that date.—“You desire my confidence ; and I therefore add that the little progress I have made in worldly matters, the heavy loss I have sustained by the war, the inconsiderable advantages I have gained by a laborious and irksome employment, and the mortifying discouragements I have met with in my clerical profession, have all conspired to depress my spirits and undermine my constitution. I was content to give up ecclesiastical preferment while I had a prospect of making some comfortable provision for my old age in my business as a teacher ; but the best of my years have now elapsed, and I am, through a most vexatious and trying series of events, not a shilling richer than when I went to Stanmore. I have this very week closed an account on which I stood indebted near £2000, which I was obliged to borrow when I launched into active life. My house at Stanmore I sold literally for less money than I expended on the repairs only. To this loss of more than £1000 I am to add near £700, which I may lose entirely, and must lose in a great measure, by the reduction of St. Vincent and St Kitt's. My patience, so far as religion prescribes it, is sufficient to support me under this severity of moral trial. But the hour is past in which I might hope to secure a comfortable independency ; and I am now labouring under the gloomy prospect of toiling, with exhausted strength, for a scanty subsistence to myself and my family. It is but eighteen months that I could pronounce a shilling my own. Now, indeed, meo sum pauper in ære [though poor, I am without debt]—but my integrity I have ever held fast.”

Possibly ; but integrity might also have been held fast in a deanery ; and certainly Dr. Parr will not pretend to hoax us with such a story as that “integrity” was all that he contemplated from his black saddle in Stanmore. Undoubtedly, he framed to himself some other good things, so fortunately arranged that they could be held in commendam with integrity. Such, however, was the naked fact, and I am sorry for it, at the time when Dr. Parr drew near to his fortieth year—at which age, as all the world knows, a man must be a fool if he is not a physician, and a physician for mind, body, and estate. Pass on, reader, for the term of almost another generation : suppose Dr. Parr to be turned of sixty, and the first light snows of early old age to be just beginning to descend upon him, and his best wig to be turning grey ;—were matters, we ask, improved at that time ? Not much. Twenty years from that Easter on which he had entered the gates of Hatton—viz. in 1806-7—had brought him within hail of a bishopric ; for his party were just then in power. Already he could descry his sleeves and his rochet ; already he could count the pinnacles of his cathedral ;—when suddenly Mr. Fox died, and his hopes evanesced in spiral wreaths of fuming Orinoco. Unfortunate Dr. Parr ! Once before he had conceived himself within an inch of the mitre ; that was in the king’s first illness, when the regency intrigue gave hopes, at one time, that Mr. Pitt would be displaced. Dr. Parr had then been summoned up to London, and he had gone so far as to lay down rules for his episcopal behaviour. But the king suddenly recovered ; many a grasping palm was then relaxed abruptly ; and, alas for Dr. Parr ! whether people died or recovered, the event was equally unfortunate. Writing, on August 25, 1807, to the Bishop of Down, he says, “If Mr. Fox had lived and continued in power, he certainly would have made me a bishop.”

Now, if Dr Parr meant to say that he had a distinct promise to that effect, that certainly is above guessing, else I should almost presume to guess that Mr. Fox neither would, nor possibly could, have made Dr Parr a bishop. It is true that Mr. Fox meant to have promoted the Bishop of Llandaff of that day, who might seem to stand in the same circumstances as a literary supporter, at least Lord Holland said to a friend of mine, "Had our party remained in office, we should have raised the Bishop of Llandaff to the Archbishopric of York." But then why? Lord Holland's reason was this—"For he" (meaning Dr. Watson) "behaved very well, I can assure you, to us" (meaning by us the whole Fox and Grenville coalition) Now, this reason (I fear) did not apply, in Mr Fox's mind, to Dr. Parr; he had behaved violently, indiscreetly, foolishly, on several occasions; he had thoroughly disgusted all other parties; he had not satisfied his own. And once, when, upon a very frivolous reason, he gave a vote for Mr. Pitt at the Cambridge election, I am satisfied myself that he meditated the notable policy of ratting,—conceiving, perhaps, that he would be cherishing a romantic punctilio of honour in adhering to a doomed party, and the letter of Lord John Townshend on that occasion convinces me that the Whigs viewed this very suspicious act in that light. Even Dr. Johnstone, I observe, doubts whether Mr. Fox would have raised Dr Parr to the mitre; and, as to everybody else, they shuddered at his very name. The Chancellor, Lord Thurlow, gave him a hearty curse, more suo, instead of a prebend; and Lord Grenville assigned, as a reason against making him a bishop, his extreme unpopularity with his own order<sup>1</sup>. As one proof of that, even the slight distinction of preaching a visitation sermon had never once been offered to Dr. Parr,—so he himself tells us in 1816, when he had completed his seventieth year,—notwithstanding he had held preferment in five different counties. Nor was it, in fact, offered for six years more; and then, being a hopeful young gentleman of seventy-six, he thought proper to decline the invitation.

Next for the emoluments of his profession—Was he better off as regards them? Else, whence came the coach-and-four? I answer that, by mere accidents of good luck, and the falling-in of some extraordinary canal profits, Dr. Parr's prebend in the cathedral of St. Paul's, given to him by Bishop Lowth upon the interest of Lord Dartmouth, produced him in his last year or two an unusually large sum; so that he had about £3000 a-year; and I am glad of it. He had also an annuity of £300 a-year, granted by the Dukes of Norfolk and Bedford, in consideration of a subscription made for Dr Parr by his political friends. But this was a kind of charity which would hardly have been offered had it not been felt that in the regular path of his profession he had not drawn, nor was likely to draw, any conspicuous prizes. In fact, but for the two accidents I have mentioned, his whole regular income from the Church, up to a period of advanced age, when Sir Francis Burdett presented him to a living of about £200 per annum, was £93 on account of his living, and £17 on account of his prebend.

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

Such were the ecclesiastical honours, and such the regular ecclesiastical emoluments, of Samuel Parr. I do not grudge him the addition, as regards the latter, which, in his closing years, he drew from the liberality of his friends and the accidents of luck. On the contrary, I rejoice that his last days passed in luxury and pomp; that he sent up daily clouds of undulating incense to the skies, and that he celebrated his birth-day regularly with ducal game and venison from the parks of princes: finally, I rejoice that he galloped about in his coach-and-four, and am not angry that, on one occasion, he nearly galloped over myself.

Still, I rejoice that all these luxuries came to him irregularly, and not at all, or (if at all) indirectly and by accident, through the Church. As regards that, and looking not to the individual, but entirely to the example, I rejoice that, both for her honours and emoluments, Dr. Parr missed them altogether. Such be the fate of all unfaithful servants, in whatsoever profession or office of trust! So may those be still baffled and confounded who pass their lives in disparaging and traducing their own honourable brethren, and who labour (whether consciously and from treachery, or half-consciously and from malice and vanity) for the subversion of institutions which they are sworn, pledged, and paid to defend!

My conclusion, therefore, the epimethion of my review, is this: that, considered as a man of the world, keenly engaged in the chase after rank and riches, Dr Parr must be pronounced to have failed,—that his rare and late successes were casual and indirect, whilst his capital failures were due exclusively to himself. His two early bosom friends and schoolfellows, Dr. Bennet and Sir W Jones, he saw raised to the rank of a bishop and a judge, whilst he was himself still plodding as a schoolmaster. And this mortifying distinction in their lots was too obviously imputable, not to any more scrupulous integrity in him, soothing as that hypothesis was to his irritated vanity, but solely to his own hotheaded defect of self-control—baffling the efforts of his friends, and neutralising the finest opportunities. Both of those eminent persons, the bishop as well as the judge, deeply disapproved of his conduct, though they agreed in candour, and in the most favourable construction of his meaning; and though they allowed him the largest latitude for his politics—one of them being what is termed a liberal Tory, and the other an ardent Whig. And yet, with the full benefit of this most latitudinarian privilege, he could not win their toleration to his indiscretions. So that, purely by his own folly, and in headstrong opposition to the concurring tendencies of his opportunities and his extra advantages, Samuel Parr failed utterly as an ambitious man of the world. It remains to inquire how much better he succeeded as a politician, a scholar, and a divine.

SECTION II

READER! perhaps you have heard of churls who, being embarked in some magnificent ship upon an East India voyage, have manifested no interest at all in the partners of their hopes and hazards. Far be such apathy from myself and my friends! The merest poco-curante or misanthrope, whom long freezing experience of the world has brought to the temper of fixed and contemptuous disregard for man as a species, not seldom makes an exception in favour of the particular John, Wilham, or James, whom accident has embarked in the same enterprise, or associated in the same perils, with himself. Dan Dancer, the miser, who would not have risked a half-crown upon a fire-escape or a life-boat for ten generations whom he had not personally known, nevertheless fought the battles of the paupers in his own neighbourhood, and headed them in their campaigns for rights of common and turbary with the most disinterested heroism. Elwes, the prince of misers, sometimes laid aside his narrow cares for the duties of a patriot. No man so memorably selfish who has not, on some occasion of his life, felt the social instinct which connects his else contemptible race, and acknowledged the duties which grow out of it. As to the good and generous, they cannot travel so much as a Jewish Sabbath-day's journey in company with another, participating in common purposes for the time, and liable to common inconveniences of weather or accident, and even to common possibilities of danger, without recognising something beyond a stranger's claim to offices of kindness or courtesy in the transient relations of a fellow-traveller.

Yet these are, in their nature, felt to be perishable connexions. Neighbourhood is a relation either purely of accident, or of choice not primarily determined by consideration of neighbours. And the brief associations of public carriages or inns are as evanescent as the sandy columns of the Great Desert, which the caprices of the wind build up and scatter, shape and unshape, within the brief revolution of a minute. Seldom, indeed, does a second sun shine upon fellow-travellers in modern England. And neighbourhood, if a more durable tie, is often one even less consciously made known to the parties concerned. If, then, connexions casual as these, where the vinculum of the relation is so finely spun as to furnish rather a verbal classification to the logician than a practical subject of duties to the moralist, are yet acknowledged by the benevolent as imposing some slight obligations of consideration and service, much more ought an AUTHOR to find, in the important circumstances which connect the ministers of the press, in their extensive fellowship of duties, rights, powers, interests, and necessities, a bond of fraternal alliance, and more than fraternal sympathy. Too true it is that authors are sometimes blockheads, and by the remotest of possibilities even knaves. Too commonly it happens that, in the occasions and the motives which originally drew them into authorship, there is little or nothing to command respect. Venter largitor ingenii: the stomach, that keen developer of talent, is the great feeder of the metropolitan press; and, amongst the few who commence authors upon arguments less gross and instant, there are not many who do so from impulses that are exclusively noble.

Considerations such as these are at war with all sentiments of regard for the mere backs of the press, who, having no natural summons to so fine a vocation, pervert literature—the noblest of professions—into the vilest of trades. But, wherever that is not primâ facie presumable, wherever circumstances allow us to suppose that a man has taken up the office of author with adequate pretensions, and a proper sense of his responsibilities, every other author of generous nature will allow him the benefit of that privilege which all over the world attaches to co-membership in any craft, calling, or guild whatsoever—even those which are illiberal or mechanical; a fortiori in those which are intellectual. Surgeons bleed surgeons for love, physicians assassinate physicians gratis. Superannuated actors are everywhere free, I believe, of the theatre. And an author who has exercised his craft in a liberal, courteous, and honourable spirit, is entitled in that character to the indulgence of all professional authors, and above all he is entitled to entire amnesty as respects his politics. These are claims which I cheerfully allow to Trojan and Tyrian—to Whig and Tory alike; and I come to the consideration of Dr. Parr as a scholar and as an author with perfect freedom from all prejudice, anxious to give him the fullest benefit of his real merits, and dismissing all unpleasant recollections of that factious and intemperate character which, most superfluously, he put forward in politics and divinity.

Dr. Parr as an author! That very word in my ear sounds ridiculous, apart from every question upon the quality or value of what he wrote. As a literary man, as a scholar, prepared by reading and research for appreciating a considerable proportion of the past or the current literature, Dr. Parr, I willingly concede, stood upon somewhat higher ground than the great body of his clerical brethren. But even this I say with hesitation; for it is scarcely to be believed, except by those who have gone with an observant eye into English society, how many rural clergymen go down to their graves unheard of by the world, and unacquainted with the press, unless perhaps by some anonymous communication to a magazine, or by an occasional sermon—who have beguiled the pains of life by researches unusually deep into some neglected or unpopular branches of professional learning. Such persons, it is true, are in general unequally learned, so indeed are most men, so, beyond all men, was Dr. Parr. I do not believe that he possessed any one part of knowledge accurately, unless it were that section of classical learning which fell within his province as a schoolmaster. The practice of a long life naturally made him perfect in that—perfect, at least, in relation to the standard of that profession. But how small a part of classical researches lie within the prescriptive range of a practising schoolmaster! The duties of an academic professor may have a wider compass; but it must be a pure labour of supererogation in a teacher of any school for boys if he should make his cycle of study very comprehensive. Even within that cycle, as at this time professed by some first-rate teachers, was Dr. Parr master of everything? In some of its divisions was he even master of anything? For example, how much did he know—has he left it upon record, in any one note, exegetical or illustrative, upon any one obscure or disputed passage of any one classic, that he knew anything at all in the vast and interminable field of classical antiquities? The formulæ of the Roman calendar were, of course, known to him as a writer of Latin epitaphs; for the chronology of the grave, as I shall have occasion to notice a little further ahead, has its own special varieties of delicate scientific caprice. But these niceties are soon learned from Morcellus.<sup>1</sup> And even on that subject—even on the practical applications of chronology to the usages of daily life, or to the severe requisitions of law—was Dr. Parr the learned man that common fame reputed him to be? To take one case amongst a thousand, when the year 1800 brought up a question<sup>1</sup> in its train—Was it to be considered the last year of the eighteenth century, or the first of the nineteenth?—did Dr. Parr come forward with an oracular determination of our scruples, or did he silently resign that pleading to the humble hands of the laureate—Pye? Or again, shifting from questions of time to those of space, has Dr. Parr contributed so much as his mite to the very interesting, important, and difficult subject of classical geography? Yet these were topics which lay within his beat as a schoolmaster. If we should come upon the still higher ground of divinity and Christian antiquities, perhaps upon those it might appear that Dr. Parr had absolutely no pretensions at all. But, not to press such questions too closely or invidiously, whatever might be the amount of his attainments under these heads, were it little or were it much, scanty as the measure of my faith in them, or co-extensive with the vaunts of his friends—still all this has reference only to his general capacity as a man of letters, whereas we are called upon to consider Dr. Parr also as an author. Indeed we have now no other means for estimating his posse as a scholar than through his esse as a writer for the press.

<sup>1</sup> S. T. Morcelli, an Italian writer on "Inscriptions," 1737-1821.
—M.

This is my task; and this it is which moves my mirth, whilst it taxes the worthy Doctor and his friends with a spirit of outrageous self-delusion. Dr. Parr as an author! And what, now, might happen to be the Doctor's works? For I protest, upon my honour, that I never heard their names. Was ever case like this? Here is a learned doctor, whose learned friend has brought him forward as a first-rate author of his times, and yet nothing is extant of his writing, beyond an occasional preface, or a pamphlet on private squabbles. But are not his Opera Omnia collected and published by this friendly biographer, and expanded into eight enormous tomes? True; and the eight tomes contain, severally, the following hyperbolic amount of pages.—

<sup>1</sup> “Brought up a question”—Which question was virtually again brought up by the year 1850—are we to regard that year last of the first bisection in the nineteenth century, or first of the last bisection? And every fifty years the same exact question will recur.

	PAGES.
Vol. I . . . . .	850
II . . . . .	701
III . . . . .	715
IV . . . . .	718
V . . . . .	715
VI . . . . .	699
VII . . . . .	680
VIII . . . . .	656
Total . . . . .	5734

Yes! five thousand seven hundred and thirty-four octavo pages, many of them printed in a small type, are the apparent amount of Samuel Parr's works in the edition of Dr. Johnstone, and it is true, besides, that the very élite of his papers is omitted—such as his critical notices of books in the Monthly and Critical Reviews or the “British Critic,” and his essay on the word Sublime, addressed to Mr. Dugald Stewart. Add what is omitted, and the whole would be little short of seven thousand pages. And yet, spite of that, not one “work” of Dr. Parr's is extant which can, without laughter, assume that important name. The preface to Bellenden is, after all, by much the weightiest and most regular composition, and the least of a fugitive tract.<sup>1</sup> Yet this is but a jeu d'esprit, or classical proclusion. And I believe the case to be unexampled, that, upon so slender a basis, a man of the world, and reputed a man of sense, should set up for an author. Well might the author of the “Pursuits of Literature” (1797) demand—“What has Dr. Parr written? A sermon or two, rather long; a Latin preface to Bellendenus (rather long too), consisting of a cento of Latin and Greek expressions, applied to political subjects, another preface to some English Tracts, and two or three English pamphlets about his own private quarrels: and this man is to be compared with Dr. Samuel Johnson!!”

Certainly the world had never before seen so great a

<sup>1</sup> An edition of the De Statu Prisci Orbis of the Scottish scholar William Bellenden was published in 1787, with a preface by Dr. Parr.—M.

pomp of pretension rising from so slight a ground. The delusion was absolutely unrivalled, and prevailed throughout Dr. Parr's long life. He and his friends seemed constantly to appeal to some acknowledged literary reputation, established upon foundations that could not be shaken, and notorious to all the world. Such a mistake, and in that extent, was never heard of before. Dr. Parr talked, and his friends listened, not only as giving and receiving oracles of moral wisdom, but of wisdom owned to be such by all the world; whereas this auctoritas (to borrow a Roman word for its Roman sense), whether secretly due to the Doctor or not, evidently could not exist as a fact, unless according to the weight and popularity of published works by which the world had been taught to know him and to rank him. Starting originally from the erroneous assumption, insinuated by his preposterous self-conceit, that he was Johnson redivivus, he adopted Johnson's colloquial pretensions—and that was vainglorious folly; but he also conceived that these pretensions were familiarly recognised—and that was frenzy. To Johnson, as a known master in a particular style of conversation—not the very best within the whole classified range of styles, not the most difficult, not the most instructive, but a finished specimen of its particular kind—everybody gave way; and upon all questions with moral bearings he was supposed to have the rights and precedency of a judicial chair. But this prerogative he had held in right of his works,—works, not which he merely ought to have written (see Dr Johnstone's "Memoirs of Parr," p. 464), but which he had written, printed, and published. Strange that Dr Parr should overlook so obvious a distinction! Yet he did so for fifty years. Dining, for instance, at Norfolk House, the duke having done him the honour to invite him to the same table with the Prince of Wales, such was his presumption in the presence of the heir-apparent, of the premier peer of England, and of all the illustrious leaders from the Opposition side of the two Houses, that he fully believed it to be his vocation to stand forward as the spokesman of the company. It gave him no check, it suggested no faltering scruple, that Mr. Fox was on one side the table, and Sheridan on the other. His right he conceived it to be to play the foremost part, and to support the burden of conversation between his royal highness and the splendid party assembled to meet him. Accordingly, on some casual question arising as to the comparative merits of Bishop Hurd and Archbishop Markham as Greek scholars, in which the prince delivered a plain and sensible evidence in favour of the latter from facts of his own youthful experience, Parr strutted forward, with the mingled licence of Jacobinism and paradox, to maintain a thesis against him. "I," said the Prince of Wales, "esteem Markham a much greater, wiser, and more learned man than Hurd, and a better teacher; and you will allow me to be a judge, for they were both my preceptors." Here was a direct opinion, and the prince afterwards gave reasons for it equally direct. A simple answer, as brief as the original position, was all that good breeding or etiquette allowed. But Dr Parr found an occasion for a concio, and prepared to use it. "Sir," said he, "is it your royal highness's pleasure that I should enter upon the topic of their comparative merits as a subject of discussion?"—"Yes," said the prince.—"Then, sir," said Dr. Parr, "I differ entirely from your royal highness in opinion." One would suppose, by his formal preparation, that Dr Parr was some sergeant-at-law rising to argue a case before the judges at Westminster. The prince, however, had permitted him to proceed. under the special appeal made to him, what else could he do? And, by way of acknowledging this courteous allowance, with the true soul of a low-bred democrat, Parr starts with a point-blank contradiction of his royal highness, put as broadly and coarsely as he knew how.<sup>1</sup>

Perhaps there are not ten men in Europe, occupying at the time no higher station than that of country schoolmaster, who would have had the front—in the presence of the Prince of Wales, or the Dauphin of France—to step before the assembled wits of Paris or London, and the great leaders of parties, as the rightful claimant of the royal ear, and natural representative of the illustrious party assembled at Norfolk House—all distinguished by high birth, talents, or station. Brass, triply bronzed, was requisite for this. "Thou art the great toe of this society; because that thou, being lowest, basest, meanest, still goest foremost." Arrogance towards his fellow-claimants was not enough for Dr. Parr, unless he might also be arrogant towards the prince. In high-bred society, all disputation whatsoever—nay, all continued discussion—is outrageously at war with the established tone of conversation ; a dispute must be managed with much more brilliancy, much more command of temper, a much more determinate theme, and a much more obvious progress towards a definite result in the question at issue, than are commonly found—not to prove grievously annoying to all persons present, except the two disputants. High-breeding and low-breeding differ not more in the degrees of refinement which characterise their usages than in the good sense upon which these usages have arisen. Certainly, mere good sense is sufficient, without any experience at all of high life, to point out the intolerable absurdity of allowing two angry champions to lock up and sequesterate, as it were, the whole social enjoyment of a large party, and compel them to sit "in sad civility" witnesses of a contest which can interest the majority neither by its final object nor its management. Social pleasure is the end and purpose of society, and whatsoever interferes with that should be scourged out of all companies. But, if disputing be intolerable, what shall we say of blank contradiction offered to a Prince of Wales—not in prosecution of some point of public service, but as an elegant condiment to the luxuries of colloquial intercourse? To turn your back upon the king, to put a question to him, to pull out your watch in his presence—all these are notorious trespasses against the etiquette of courts, and reasonably so ; because they are all habits which presuppose a carelessness of demeanour incompatible with that reverence and decorous homage which should never slumber in the presence of a king, considered not as an individual, but as a state creature, embodying the majesty of a great nation. A Prince of Wales, or whosoever occupies that near relation to the throne, has the same sanctity of public character ; and a man of sense, though a red-hot republican from the banks of the Potomac, would as little allow himself to forget that as to insult a judge upon the bench. It is not the prince as an individual that is considered, but the prince as representative of a great nation; it is not the judge personally that is regarded, but the sanctities of law and justice.

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

Had the matter in dispute been some great question of constitutional policy, or in any way applicable to the prince's future behaviour in life, or in many other circumstances that might be imagined, we can suppose a sort of propriety in the very breach of propriety. But the question was, in this case, too trivial to justify the least eccentricity of manner. He who courts the character of an abnormis sapiens (an uncouth rustic philosopher) should be careful that his indecours and singularity cover some singular strength of character or some weight of fine sense. As it was, Dr. Parr was paradoxical and apparently in the wrong; the prince direct and rational. With what disadvantage to Dr. Parr, on this occasion, and afterwards in his relation to Queen Caroline, do we recall the simple dignity of Dr. Johnson, when presented to George III! Dr. Parr's introduction was at a dinner-table, Dr. Johnson's in a library; and in their separate styles of behaviour one might fancy each to have been governed by the presiding genius of the place. Johnson behaved with the dignity of a scholar and a loyal son of the Muses, under the inspiration of "strong book-mindedness"<sup>1</sup>; Parr with the violence of a pedagogue under the irritations of wine and indigestion. In reality, Dr Parr's effrontery was chiefly to be traced to that one fact in his life—that for forty years he swayed the sceptre of a pedagogue. Native arrogance was the root; but the "bright consummate flower" was unfolded and matured by his long reign as a tyrant over schoolboys. To borrow his own words, with one slight omission, in speaking of a Cambridge head, his "manners and temper were spoiled by the pedantries, and pomposities, and fooleries which accompany the long exercise of petty archdidascalian authority"

"Archdidascalian authority"! Thanks to Dr. Parr for one, at least, of his sesquipedalian words; for that one contains the key to his whole life, and to the else mysterious fact that a pamphleteer, a party pamphleteer, a pamphleteer in the service of private brawls, trod the stage, on all occasions, with the air of some great patriarch of letters or polemic champion of the Church. Who could believe that Dr Parr's friend and biographer, in the very act of publishing eight volumes entitled "Works of Dr. Parr," should yet have no better answer to the contemptuous demand from the "Pursuits of Literature"—"What has Dr. Parr written?"—than simply an expression of regret (vol. 1. p. 464) "that, with such powers, and such means of gathering information from every quarter, Dr Parr did NOT produce some great work on some great subject." He goes on to lament that Parr did not, "like Clarendon, give the history of that awful period of which he saw the springtide, and in part the issue; or, like Burnet, that he did not relate, in a familiar manner, the transactions of the period in which he lived; or, like Tacitus, paint in caustic and living colours the atrocities of some of which he was a witness, and deliver, as an everlasting memorial to posterity, the characters of those who bore a part in them." But, with submission, Posterity are a sort of people whom it is very difficult to get at; whatever other good qualities Posterity may have, accessibility is not one of them. A man may write eight octavos, specially addressed to Posterity, and get no more hearing from the wretches than had he been a stock and they been stones. As to those "everlasting memorials" which Dr. Johnstone and Thucydides talk of, it is certainly advisable to "deliver" them—but troublesome and injurious to the digestive organs.

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

Another biographer, who unites with Dr. Johnstone in lamenting "that he (viz Parr) did not undertake some work of a superior kind calculated for permanent utility and more durable fame," goes on in the following terms.—"It is hinted, however, by a periodical writer, that he could not produce more creditable works; and for this reason—that he was, as it were, overlaid with acquired knowledge; the flood of his memory burst in on his own original powers and drowned them." But, in that case, I would venture to hope that some Humane Society, like that on the banks of the Serpentine, will arise to save hopeful young men from such sad catastrophes; so that "acquired knowledge" may cease to prove so fatal a possession, and native ignorance be no longer a conditio sine quâ non for writing "creditabile works." Meantime, whatever were the cause, the fact, we see, is admitted by Dr. Parr's best friends—that he did not write any great, durable, or creditable work ; and the best excuse for him which Dr. Johnstone's ingenuity can devise is that neither Archbishop Markham nor Dean Cyril Jackson wrote anything better. True : but the reason which makes such an excuse not entirely available to the case is this, that neither the archbishop nor the dean arrogated that place and authority in letters which they had not won : they had both been employed in the same sort of labour as Dr. Parr ; they had severally assisted in the education of a great prince, and they were content with the kind of honour which that procured them. And, for Cyril Jackson in particular, he was content with less : for he persisted to the last in declining the mitre which he had earned. No : the simple truth is, as we have stated, that Dr. Parr assumed his tone of swagger and self-sufficiency in part, perhaps, from original arrogance of nature, and a confidence which he had in his own powers, but chiefly from a long life of absolute monarchy within the walls of a schoolroom. The nature of his empire was absolute and unlimited despotism in the worst form, described by Aristotle in his "Politics" as Pambasileia. There is no autocrat so complete, not the Czar of all the Russias, as one or other of these two tyrants—first, the captain of a king's ship, or, secondly, the head-master of a grammar school. Both of them are irresponsible, ἀνυπευθύνουι, in the utmost degree. And, for Parr in particular, not only was he an autocrat, but, if he is not greatly belied, he was a capricious and Algerine tyrant, who went the whole length of his opportunities for showing partial favour, or inflicting vindictive punishment. And he had this peculiarity, that, whilst other tyrants find a present gratification in their severities, but shrink from their contemplation, Parr treated his as Plato's suppers—they were luxuries for the moment, and subjects of sweet consolatory exultation in the retrospect. Long after a man had entered the world as an active citizen, Dr Parr used to recall, as the most interesting tie which could connect this man with himself, that at some distant period he had flogged him ; and from one biographer it appears that, in proportion to his approbation of a boy, and the hopes with which he regarded him, were the frequency and the severity of his flagellations. To a man who reigned in blood, and banqueted (like Moloch) upon children's cries, we may suppose that resistance was unheard of: and hence, I repeat, the despotic arrogance with which he came abroad before the world. But what, it will be asked, on the side of the public, gave success to this arrogance? How was it that in his lifetime this insolence of assumption prospered? Partly, I answer, through the insolence itself: in all cases that does wonders. The great majority of men are ready to swear by any man's words, if he does but speak with audacity.

In process of time, however, this resource will fail a man, unless reinforced by auxiliary means; and these I conceive to have lain in two circumstances, without which Parr never would have gained a height so disproportioned to his performances. In the first place, Parr was a Whig; and the Whigs, as then the party militant, made much of all who stuck by them. Hence the excessive compliments which flowed in upon Dr. Parr from Edinburgh, and from persons, such as Dugald Stewart, who had otherwise no particular value for the whole class of Dr. Parr's pretensions. The Whigs are wise in their generation; and, like the Dissenters from the Church of England, they make men sensible that it is good to be of their faction; for they never forsake those who adhere faithfully to them. Dr. Parr, indeed, was rather a slippery partisan, but this was not generally known. His passions carried him always back to Whiggism; and his general attachment was notorious, whilst his little special perfidies or acts of trimming were secrets to all but a very few. A second circumstance in the Doctor's favour was this—that, as a schoolmaster, he was throwing into public life a continual stream of pupils, who naturally became partisans and obstinate proneurs. In some instances, he educated both father and son; and, though it is true that here and there an eccentric person retains too lively a remembrance of past flagellations, and is with some difficulty restrained from cudgelling or kicking the flagellator, still, as a general case, it may be held that such recollections of the boy do not weigh much in the practice of the man. Most certain it is that, had Dr. Parr been other than an active Whig in politics—or had he not been a schoolmaster of ancient and extensive practice—he never could as a literary man have risen so abruptly above the natural level of his performances as in fact he did. And, now that he is dead, and the activity of such adventitious aids is rapidly beginning to fail him, he will sink doubtless even more abruptly to his just standard than ever he rose above it; or, perhaps by the violence of such a natural reaction, will be carried very much below it: which fate is now (1857) realised.

There is another scale, from which it is probable that some persons may have taken their literary estimate of the Doctor—viz. the scale avoirdupois. For it is very possible that, upon putting the eight volumes of works (as edited by Dr. Johnstone) on a butcher's steelyard, it may have been ascertained that they draw against a weight of three stone six pounds. Infinite levity in particular cases amounts practically to ruinous gravity; a vast host of fluttering pamphlets, letters, and stray leaves, make up one huge geological boulder. It becomes necessary, therefore, to state the substance of the whole eight volumes. Briefly, then, the account stands thus—Volume I. contains Memoirs (with some Extracts from Letters). The two last contain Correspondence. Three other volumes contain Sermons: of which two volumes are mere parish discourses, having no more right to a place in a body of literary works than the weekly addresses to his congregation of any other rural clergyman. Thus, out of six volumes, one only is really privileged to take its rank under the general title of the collection. The two remaining volumes (the third and fourth) contain Dr. Parr's miscellaneous pamphlets, with some considerable omissions not accounted for by the editor. These two volumes are, in fact, all that can properly be described as of a literary nature and to these I shall resort for matter in the close of my review.

Meantime, I am satisfied that the correspondence of Dr. Parr and his friends, for the very reason that it was written with no view (or no uniform view) to the press, is that part of the whole collection which will be read by the greatest number of readers, and with most interest by all readers. I shall throw a glance on such parts of this correspondence as have a value in reference to the development of Dr. Parr's character, or have any separate interest on their own account

Among the earliest of the literary acquaintances which Dr. Parr had the opportunity of forming was that of Dr Johnson. Writing in 1821 (January 6) to Mr. Joseph Cradock, who had said a few days before that perhaps, upon the death of Dr Strahan, he himself "must be the oldest of Dr. Johnson's friends who knew him intimately during the last five or six years of his life," Dr. Parr takes occasion to retrace the nature of his own connexion with that eminent person.—"Well, dear sir, I sympathise with you in your pleasure and in your pride, when you represent yourself as the oldest remaining scholar who lived upon terms of intimacy with Samuel Johnson. You saw him often, and you met him often, in the presence of Goldsmith, Garrick, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and other literary heroes I acknowledge the great superiority of your claims Lord Stowell,<sup>1</sup> I should suppose, will stand in the next place; and I challenge for myself the third. For many years I spent a month's holidays in London, and never failed to call upon Johnson. I was not only admitted, but welcomed. I conversed with him upon numberless subjects of learning, politics, and common life. I traversed the whole compass of his understanding; and, by the acknowledgment of Burke and Reynolds, I distinctly understood the peculiar and <sup>1</sup> "Lord Stowell" —On revising these pages for a generation in advance by more than thirty years of many who are chiefly concerned in their notices, it has become necessary to explain that Lord Stowell, originally Sir William Scott, was the brother of the great Chancellor, Lord Eldon, and equally distinguished as a lawyer, though in a very different field. He was the oracle of the Admiralty Courts, and the business of those courts being prodigiously enlarged by the war, and by the furious struggle between our British orders in council and the Napoleon decrees issued at Berlin and Milan, naturally it happened that Lord Stowell fell under the widest circle of cognisance, and consequently of hostile (sometimes of malignant) interpretation from the continental publicists and jurists—all to a man bought and paid for by Napoleon. His reputation, at one time most splendid, rests generally upon the expansion which he gave to the principles of international law, and, amongst his countrymen, upon the scholar-like elegance and sustained dignity of his judicial style.

“transcendental properties of his mighty and virtuous mind
 “I intended to write his life. I laid by sixty or seventy “books for the purpose of writing in such a manner as “would do no discredit to myself. I intended to spread my “thoughts over two volumes quarto; and, if I had filled
 “three pages, the rest would have followed. Often have I “lamented my ill fortune in not building this monument to “the fame of Johnson, and (let me not be accused of arro“gance when I add) my own.”

William Wordsworth, when he dedicated, in a few lines at once modest and dignified, his “Excursion” to the present (now, 1857, the late) Lord Lonsdale, with that accurate valuation of words which is one of his greatest poetical accomplishments, offers it as “A token (may it prove a monument !)

 Of high respect,” etc

A token, or pledge of his attachment, the poem was, at any rate, by the mere act of dedication; whether it should also be a monument, a monumental token, that was for posterity to determine; and, if others were at liberty to anticipate such a result, the author, at least, was not. And, at all events, the mere logic of the case made it inevitable that whatever proved a monument to the fame of Dr. Johnson should be such also to the fame of him who raised it; for, of a structure which should happen to be durable as a record of Dr. Johnson, it is mere tautology to say that it must also be durable as the workmanship of Dr. Parr. One and the same work could not have a divided character, or a separate destiny, in its different relations, could not be immortal as a record, and at the same time perishable as a memorial of the recorder.

But can it be imagined that Dr. Parr’s clumsy masonry could raise a monument to anybody? For Dr. Johnson, in particular, all that he could have done with effect would have been a short excursus or appendix to Boswell, on the pretensions of Johnson as a classical scholar. These were greater than it is the custom to suppose. Dr. John Johnstone, indeed, somewhere has thought fit to speak of him in that character as immeasurably inferior to Parr. This is not true. Certainly, I am satisfied that Dr. Johnson was no very brilliant Grecian; the haste and trepidation which he showed in declining Dr. Burney's application for assistance on the Greek tragedians sufficiently establish that. But there is no reason to suppose that, in this part of scholarship, Dr. Parr had the least advantage of him: if he had, why are the evidences of his superiority so singularly wanting? or in what corner of forgotten literature are we to seek them? As Latin scholars, both were excellent: Parr, from practice, had the greater command over the delicacies and varieties of prose diction, Johnson, from natural talent, had by much the greater facility in verse. Elaborate ingenuity is far more in request for metrical purposes in Latin—knowledge of the idiom for prose. It might be shown, indeed, that exquisite facility in the management of thoughts, artifices of condensation or of substitution, of variation or inversion, are for the writer of Latin verse transcendent to any acquaintance with the Latin idiom: the peculiar treatment of an idea, which metre justifies and vindicates from what would else seem affectation, creates its own style. Johnson, in those relics of his Latin verses which have been preserved, benefited by that advantage; Parr, writing in Latin prose, and writing purely as a rhetorician, was taxed in the severest degree for a command over the idiomatic wealth of the language, and, for what is still less to be obtained from dictionaries, for a command over a Latin structure of sentence, and over the subsidiary forms of connexion and transition. In the preface to Bellenden, he answered the demand upon him, and displayed very unusual skill in the accomplishments of a Latin scholar. Latin composition, in fact, if we except bell-ringing, was the one sole thing, in the nature of accomplishments, which Dr. Parr seems to have possessed. Among the fine arts, certainly, I admit, that he understood bell-ringing thoroughly,<sup>1</sup> and I was on the point of forgetting to add that in the art of slaughtering oxen,<sup>2</sup> which he cultivated early as an amateur, his merit was conspicuous. Envy itself was driven to confess it; and none but the blackest-hearted Tory would go about at this time of day to deny it. Still, of these three accomplishments, one only seems available to a biography of Dr. Johnson; and that would barely have sufficed for the least important chapter of the work.

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

<sup>2</sup> Ταυροκτονεῖν is the word of Sir W. Jones, but bulls, unless for Pagan sacrificial purposes, were nowhere, and at no time, slaughtered.

After all, was Parr really intimate with Johnson? I doubt it: for he must in that case have submitted to a kind of dissimulation bitter to a proud spirit. He was a Jacobite by inheritance: that would have pleased Dr. Johnson well, but then by profession he was a Whig—a sort of monster which the Doctor could not abide, and which he deduced genealogically from Satan, and (worse than that!) he was a Whig renegade—such a combination of monstrous elements in a man's character as none of us can abide. To be a Whig is bad—to be a traitor is bad—but to be a Whig and a traitor is too much for humanity. Such features of his character Parr must have dissembled, and thus would at once pique his self-love, and limit his power. One anecdote, rich in folly and absurdity, is current about an interview between Johnson and Parr, in which the latter should have stamped whenever the other stamped, and, being called upon to explain this sonorous antiphony, replied, that he could not think of allowing his antagonist to be so much as a stamp ahead of him. Miss Seward, I think, was in the habit of telling this story, though Sir Walter Scott has not recorded it in his edition of that lady's works. But she was one of the dealers in marvels, for ever telling of "gigantic powers" and "magnificent displays" in conversation, beyond anything that her heroes were seen to have effected in their writings. I remember well that she used to talk of a particular dispute between Johnson and Parr, which in her childish conceit (for she had not herself been present) was equal to some conflict between Jupiter and one of the Titans. Possibly it was the stamping dispute, which we may be assured was a fiction. No man—least of all Sam Johnson—falling into any gesticulation or expression of fervour from a natural and uncontrollable impulse, would bear to see his own involuntary acts parodied and reverberated as it were in a cool spirit of mimicry; that would be an insult; and Johnson would have resented it by flooring his man instanter,

—a matter very easy indeed to him ; for in every sense he was qualified to “take the conceit” out of Dr. Parr. Or, perhaps, though I rather incline to think that Miss Seward’s dispute turned upon some political question, the following, as recorded by Parr himself (“Parriana,” p. 321), might be the particular case alluded to.—“Once, sir, Sam and I” (v.e. Sam Johnson) “had a vehement dispute upon that most “difficult of all subjects—the origin of evil. It called forth “all the powers of our minds. No two tigers ever grappled “with more fury ; but we never lost sight of good manners “There was no Boswell present to detail our conversation. “Sir, he would not have understood it. And then, sir, “who do you think was the umpire between us ? That “fiend Horsley.”

Miserable fudge ! “Grappling like tigers” upon the origin of evil ! How, but by total confusion of mind, was that possible upon such a question ? One octavo page would state the outline of all that has ever been accomplished on this subject ; and the German philosopher Kant, whom Dr. Parr professed to have studied, and from whom he borrowed one polysyllable, and apparently one solitary idea, has in a short memoir sketched the outline of all past attempts (especially that of Liebnitz), and the causes of failure. Libraries may be written upon any question ; but the whole nodus of this particular question lies in a brief series of six sentences , and as yet no real advance has been made in solving it. As to Dr. Johnson, it happens that we all know what he could do in this matter, for he has given us the cream of his meditations in a review of Soame Jenyns.<sup>1</sup> Trifling more absolute, on a philosophic subject, does not exist. Could Dr Parr do better ? Had he one new idea on the question ? If so, where is it ? I remember obscurely some sentence or other of purest commonplace on this point in one of his sermons. Further on I may have an occasion for producing it. At present it is sufficient to say that as philosophers only could Parr and Johnson ever converse upon equal terms. Both being equally blind by natural constitution of mind, and equally unprepared by study or reading in that department, there was no room for differences between them, except such as were extra-essential or alien to the subject. On every other topic that could have arisen to divide them, Johnson, with one grasp of his muscular hand, would have throttled the whole family of Parrs. Had Parr presumed to talk that sort of incendiary politics in which he delighted, and which the French Revolution ripened into Jacobinism, Johnson would have committed an assault upon him. As that does not appear to have happened, I venture to suppose that their intercourse was but trifling; still, for one who had any at all with Johnson, many of his other acquaintance seem a most incongruous selection. The whole orchestra of rebels, incendiaries, state criminals, all who hated the Church and State, all who secretly plotted against them, or openly maligned them, the faction of Jacobinism through its entire gamut—ascending from the first steps of disaffection or anti-national feeling to the full-blown activity of the traitor and conspirator—enjoyed a plenary indulgence from the curate of Hatton, and were inscribed upon the roll of his correspondents. I pause with a sense of shame in making this bold transition from the upright Sam Johnson, full of prejudice, but the eternal champion of social order and religion, to the fierce Septembrisers who come at intervals before us as the friends, companions, or correspondents (in some instances as the favourites) of Dr. Parr. Learning and good morals are aghast at the association!

<sup>1</sup> See ante, vol. III, p. 20.—M.

It is singular, or at first sight it seems so, that brigaded with so many scowling republicans are to be found, as occasional correspondents of Dr. Parr, nearly one-half of our aristocracy—two or three personages of royal blood, eight dukes, five marquises, six-and-twenty earls, thirteen viscounts, one-and-thirty barons or courtesy lords; to say nothing of distinguished women—a queen, several duchesses, countesses, and daughters of earls, besides baronesses and honourables in ample proportion. Many of these, however, may be set down as persons systematically (oftentimes insolently) negligent of political principles in correspondents of no political power. The covert meaning in such cases is this. Oh, as to political principles, my friend, yours, it is true, are rotten and detestable; so that, if you occupied any considerable station that gave weight to your opinions, I should be obliged to cut you: but confessedly you are nobody, so that I can conscientiously retain your acquaintance, whilst disregarding your little impotent treasons, as so much babble uttered by a child of three years old. But what are we to think of ten judges (besides Lord Stowell) addressing, with the most friendly warmth, one who looked upon all their tribe as the natural tools of oppression; and no fewer than forty bishops, and four archbishops, courting the notice of a proud priest who professed it as an axiom that three out of every five on the Episcopal Bench were perfect knaves. Oh for a little homely consistency! and, in a world where pride so largely tyrannises, oh for a little in the right place! Dr. Parr did not in so many words proclaim destruction to their order as a favourite and governing principle, but he gave his countenance to principles that would, in practice, have effected that object, and his friendship to men that pursued no other.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex opens the correspondence, according to the present arrangement of the letters—if that may be called arrangement where all is anarchy. At first I anticipated, from this precedency granted to a prince, that the Peerage and the Red Book would dictate the principle of classification; this failing, I looked to the subject, and next to the chronology. But at length I found that pretty much the same confusion obtains as in a pack of cards that has first of all been accurately arranged in suits and then very slightly shuffled. In such a case, strong symptoms occur of the sorting, continually disturbed by weak symptoms of the shuffling: two or three hearts, crossed by two or three spades; and a specious promise of diamonds, suddenly thrown into the shade by a course of clubs. Letters from the same person are usually thrown together, and sometimes a vein of the same subject prevails through a considerable tract of pages. Then suddenly all changes; a new stratum crops out; and a printer's devil seems to have determined the order of succession.

The Duke of Sussex, who has actually placed the bust of a hack dissenting book-maker,<sup>1</sup> rather than that of Aristotle or Lord Bacon, as the presiding genius of his fine library in Kensington Palace, could not, of course, find any objections to Dr. Parr in his hostility to the Church of England. His royal highness is probably indifferent on this point; whilst others, as Mr. Jeremy Bentham, could hardly fail to honour this defect in "Church-of-Englandism." The duke's letters are amiable and pleasing in their temper, but otherwise (for want of specific subject) not very interesting. Mr Bentham, in more senses than one the Lucifer of the radical politicians, is still less so; and simply because he affects the humorous, in a strain of very elaborate and very infelicitous trifling, upon the names of Parr and Fox (which he supposes to have been anticipated by Homer, in the address to Paris, Δύσπαρι, &c., and in the description of Thersites, Φοξὸς ἦν κεφαλῆν, &c.) In a second letter (February 17, 1823), which abundantly displays the old gentleman's infirmity,—who (like Lord Byron) cannot bear a rival in the public interest, no matter whether otherwise for good or for bad,—there is one passage which, amusing on its own account, furnishes also an occasion for bringing forward one of Parr's most extravagant follies in literature. It is this.—"The 1st of March," says Mr. Bentham, "or the 1st of April, comes out a number of the "European Magazine, with another portrait of ME by another "hand, considerable expectations are entertained of this likewise. "When you see a copy of a print of the House of Lords at "the time of the Queen's trial in the hand of Bowyer, and "expected to come out in a month or two, you will (if "Bowyer does not deceive me) see the phiz of your old "friend" [Jeremy, to wit] "among the spectators; and "these, how small soever elsewhere, will, in this print,

<sup>1</sup> "Book-maker."—I trust that in so describing Dr. Rees I do him no wrong. The doctor was understood to be the editor of an immense encyclopædia, originally charged to the public at £80,—latterly, I believe, at about 80 shillings. Southey, who was an admirable judge of such compilations, had received a copy as a present from the very liberal proprietors in its early or 80-pound stage; and he privately showed me such transformations and specious creations worked by paste and scissors as are elsewhere unexampled [Abraham Rees, D.D., 1743-1825, was editor of Rees's Cyclopædia, completed in 45 volumes quarto in 1819—M.]

“forasmuch as their station is in the foreground, be greater than lords. Oddly enough made up the group will be. Before me he had got an old acquaintance of mine of former days—Sir Humphry Davy he and I might have stood arm-in-arm But then came the servile poet and novelist; and then the ultra-servile sack-guzzler.<sup>1</sup> Next to him, the old radical. What an assortment!” Certainly a strange lot of clean and unclean beasts were in that ark at that time, what with Mr. Bentham’s “assortment”—what with the non mi ricordo Italians—the lawyers, pro and con—and some others that I could name. But, with regard to Mr. Jeremy’s companions in Bowyer’s print, does the reader take his meaning? I will be “as good as a chorus” to him, and interpret. The “servile poet and novelist,” then, is Sir Walter Scott, the “ultra-servile sack-guzzler,” Mr. Southey, a pure and high-minded man; the “old radical,” Mr. Corporal Cobbett. Now, with regard to the last of these, Dr. Parr considered him a very creditable acquaintance. He visited the corporal at Botley; and the corporal wrote him a letter, in which he talked of visiting Hatton (What a glorious blunder, by the way, if the old ruffian had chanced to come whilst Dr. Bridges was on duty!) Cobbett would do. but, for Sir Walter, in Dr. Parr’s estimation he was stark naught. One reason may be guessed at—the Queen, there may have been others, but this was the main reason, and the reason of that particular year. Well, so far we can allow for the Doctor’s spite. Queen Caroline was gracious and confiding towards the Doctor, until, by some mysterious offence, he had incurred her heavy displeasure.<sup>2</sup> It was natural that a person in Parr’s rank should be grateful for her notice, and that a person of Parr’s politics should befriend her cause. In that same degree, it was natural, perhaps, that he should dislike Sir Walter Scott, and look with jealousy upon his public influence as pledged to the service of her enemies. Both were in this case party men, with the single difference in Sir Walter's favour that he was of the right party; a fact that Dr. Parr could not be expected to appreciate. But was any extremity of party violence to be received as an apology for the Doctor's meanness and extravagant folly in treating so great a man (which uniformly he did) as a miserable pretender in literature? Not satisfied with simply lowering or depreciating his merits, Dr. Parr spoke of him as an errant charlatan and impostor. Discussing Sir Walter's merits as a poet, there is room undeniably for wide difference of estimates. But he that can affect blindness to the brilliancy of his claims as a novelist, and generally to the extraordinary grace of his prose, must be incapacitated for the meanest functions of a critic by original dulness of sensibility. Hear the monstrous verdict delivered by this ponderous mechanist of style, when adjudicating the quantum meruit of a writer who certainly has few rivals among ancient or modern classics in the rare art of narrating with brilliancy and effect.—“Dr. Parr's taste,” says a certain Irish poet, a Rev. Mr. Stewart, of whom or his works the reader probably now hears for the first time—“Dr. Parr's taste was exquisite, his judgment infallible. One morning he sent for me to attend him in his library. I found him seated at one side of the fire, Mrs. Parr leaning against the mantel on the opposite side, and a chair placed for me between them. ‘Mrs Parr,’ he began, ‘you have seen Moore in this spot some time ago; you now see Mr. Stewart!—The race of true poets is now nearly extinct. ‘There is you’ (turning to me), ‘and Moore, and Byron, and Crabbe, and Campbell—I hardly know of another.’” [All these, observe, were Whigs!] “‘You, Stewart, are a man of genius, of real genius, and of science, too, as well as genius. I tell you so. It is here, it is here,’ shaking his head, and sagaciously touching his forehead with his finger ‘I tell you again, it is here. As to Walter Scott, his jangle will not outlive the next century. It is namby-pamby.’” Dr. Parr is here made to speak of Sir Walter merely as a poet; but for the same person, in any other character, he had no higher praise in reserve. In the poetry of Sir Walter I pardon the Doctor for taking little interest. But what must be the condition of feeling in that writer who, without participating probably in the Doctor's delusions, could yet so complacently report to the world a body of extravagances which terminated in placing himself, an author unknown to the public, conspicuously above one amongst the most illustrious writers of his age! Dr. Parr might perhaps plead, as the apology for his share in such absurdities, the privilege of his fireside, kindness for a young friend, and a sudden call upon him for some audacity to give effect and powerful expression to his praise; but Mr. Stewart, by recording them in print, makes himself a deliberate party, under no apology or temptation whatsoever, to the whole injustice and puerility of the scene.

<sup>1</sup> “Sack-guzzler”.—The reason for this particular reproach must be sought in the antique mode of payment to the laureate (not yet, I believe, obsolete)—viz. so much money and so much wine; the wine being sherry, the main element in sack.

<sup>2</sup> See De Quincey’s Appended Note to this page —M.

Mr. Bentham, Dr. Parr, and Mr. Douglas of Glasgow, are probably the three men in Europe who have found Sir Walter Scott a trifler. Literature, in fact, and the fine arts, hold but a low rank in the estimate of the modern utilitarian republicans. All that is not tangible, measurable, ponderable, falls with them into the account of mere levities, and is classed with the most frivolous decorations of life to be an exquisite narrator is tantamount to dressing well; and a finished work of art is a showy piece of upholstery. In this vulgarity of sentiment Dr Parr could not entirely accompany his coarsest friends; for he drew largely on their indulgence himself as a trespasser in the very worst form—he was guilty of writing superfluous Latin with fluency and striking effect. It is certain, however, that the modern school of reformers had an injurious effect upon Dr. Parr's literary character, by drawing out and strengthening its harshest features. His politics became more truculent, and his intellectual sensibilities coarser, as he advanced in years. How closely he connected himself with these people I shall show in the sketch of his political history. For the present I turn with pleasure to his more elegant, though sometimes not less violent, friends amongst the old established Whig leaders. These, in their very intemperances, maintained the tone, breeding, and cultivation of gentlemen. They cherished and esteemed all parts of elegant letters, and, however much they have been in the habit of shocking our patriotism or constitutional principles, seldom offered annoyance to our tastes as scholars and men of letters.

Foremost amongst these, as foremost in politics, stood Charles Fox. His letters in this collection are uniformly in the unpretending manner which he courted : what we have too generally to regret is the absence of Dr Parr's answers, especially to those letters of Mr. Fox or his friends which communicated his jeux d'esprit in Greek verse. Meantime, as perhaps the most interesting passage in the whole collection of Dr. Parr's correspondence, I will make the following extract from a letter in which Mr. Fox states the final state of his feelings with regard to Edmund Burke. the immediate occasion being a plan, at that moment agitated, for raising a monument to Burke's memory. The date of this memorable letter is February 24, 1802 :—

“ Mackintosh wrote to me upon the subject you mention ;
 “ and I think he took my answer rather more favourably “ than he was strictly warranted to do. When he said I “ would second the proposition, I told him support was my “ word—The truth is, though I do not feel any malice “ against Burke, nor would I have in any degree thwarted “ any plan for his advantage or honour : though I feel the “ greatest gratitude for his continued kindness to me during
 “ so great a part of our lives, and a strong conviction that I “ owe to his friendship and conversation a very great portion “ of whatever either of political or oratorical merit my friends “ suppose me to have displayed : notwithstanding all this, I “ must own that there are some parts of his conduct that I “ cannot forgive so entirely as perhaps I ought, and as I wish “ to do.—His public conduct may have arisen from mistaken “ motives of right, carried to a length to which none but “ persons of his ardent imagination would have pursued “ them. But the letter to the Duke of Portland and Lord “ Fitzwilliam, with the worst possible opinion of me, is what “ I never can think of without sensations which are as little “ habitual to me as to most men. To attempt to destroy me “ in the opinion of those whom I so much value, and in “ particular that of Fitzwilliam, with whom I had lived in “ the strictest friendship from our infancy,—to attempt it, “ too, at a time and in a way which made it almost certain “ that they would not state the accusation to me, and con“ sequently that I should have no opportunity to defend “ myself,—this was surely not only malice, but baseness in “ the extreme ; and, if I were to say that I have quite for “ given it, it would be boasting a magnanimity which I can“ not feel.—In these circumstances, therefore, I think that “ even not opposing, much more supporting, any motion “ made in honour of his memory as an individual amongst “ the rest, without putting myself forward as a mover or “ seconder, is all that can be expected or desired of me by “ those who are not admirers of hypocrisy. I shall have “ great pleasure, however, in seeing your plan for an epitaph “ for him, and will tell you freely my opinion of it, both in “ general and in the detail. He was certainly a great man, “ and had very many good as well as great qualities ; but “ his motto seems the very reverse of μηδὲν ἄγαν (nothing in “ excess) ; and, when his mind had got hold of an object, his “ whole judgment, as to prudent or imprudent, unbecoming “ or indecent, nay, right or wrong, was perverted when that “ object was in question. What Quintilian says of Ovid, “ ‘ Si ingenio temperare quam indulgere maluisset,’ was emi“ nently applicable to him, even with respect to his passions.

 “ ‘ Si animi sui affectibus temperare quam indulgere “ maluisset, quid vir iste præstare non potuerit ?’<sup>1</sup> would be “ my short character of him. By the way, I do not know “ that affectibus is the right word ; but I know no other.”

Monstrous as we must consider this view of Burke’s conduct, which, under every provocation from the underlings of Mr. Fox’s party, continued irreproachably honourable towards those whom he had been compelled (and whom others<sup>2</sup> had been compelled) to abandon,—still, under the perverse prejudices which had possession of Mr. Fox, we must allow his temper and his conduct, as here stated by himself, to have been sincere, manly, and liberal. That he did not speak with more fervour of admiration, in summing up the claims of a man so immeasurably beyond his contemporaries in the

<sup>1</sup> This man, had he chosen to control rather than to humour the impulses of his native mind, what was there beyond his power of attainment ?

<sup>2</sup> Let that be deeply remembered : let it not for a moment be overlooked—which gives so violent a wrench to the whole pleading of Charles Fox—that Burke was not the only member of the Whig Club who had left it under a conscientious compulsion.

fineness and compass of his understanding, is not to be imputed to jealousy of his powers, or to the smothered resentments which Mr. Fox acknowledges—but entirely to the extreme plainness, simplicity, and almost homely character of his own mind, which laboured under a specific natural inaptitude for appreciating an intellect so complex, subtle, and elaborate, as that of Burke

We see how readily he clings to the slang notion of Burke's "imagination" as the key to all differences between them; and how resolutely he mistakes, for an original tendency to the violence of extremes, what in fact was the mere breadth and determinateness of principle which the extremity of that crisis exacted from a mind of unusual compass. Charles Fox had one grandeur, one originality, in his whole composition, and that was the fervour, the intensity, the contagious vehemence of his manner; which alone, in the absence of all other merit, might avail to plant a man on the supreme eminence as an orator. Let me draw attention to a most remarkable and significant feature in Charles Fox's idiosyncrasy. He could not endure his own speeches when stripped of the advantage they had in a tumultuous and self-kindling delivery. "I have always hated the thought," says he to Dr. Parr, "of any of my speeches being published." Why was that? Simply because, in the mere matter, he could not but feel himself that there was nothing to insure attention, nothing that could give a characteristic or memorable expression to the whole. The thoughts were everybody's thoughts. Burke's, on the other hand, were so peculiarly his own that they might have been sworn to as private property in any court of law.

How was Dr. Parr affected by this great schism in politics, the greatest which ever hinged upon pure difference of abstract principle? A schism which was fatal to the unity of the Whig Club could not but impress new determinations on the political bias, conduct, and language of every Whig partisan. At the time of the Bellenden Preface, it was a matter of course that Parr should praise Burke; he was then the ally of Fox, and the glory of the Whigs. But what tone of sentiment did Dr. Parr maintain towards this great man after he had become alienated from the revolutionary cause which he himself continued to patronise, alienated from the party which he continued to serve? For previous to that change his homage was equivocal. It might be to the man, or it might be to his partisan position.

There are many ways of arriving at a decision. In letters, in tracts (Letters on Fox's James II), and in recorded conversations, Dr. Parr's sincere opinions on this question (a question as comprehensive as any personal question ever can have been) were repeatedly obtained. He wrote, besides, an inscription for Burke's public monument; and this, which (in common with all his epitaphs) was anxiously weighed and meditated in every syllable, happens to have been the most felicitous in the opinion of himself and his friends amongst all which he executed. What was its prevailing tone? "I remember," says Parr himself, when writing to Lord Holland, "one or two of Mr. Burke's admirers said to me that it was cold; and I answered that I had indeed been successful; for, as I really did not feel warmth, I had not attempted to express it." Perhaps in these words Dr. Parr, with a courtier's consideration of the person whom he was addressing, has done some injustice to himself. Enough remains on record, both in the epitaph and elsewhere, to show that he had not indeed attained to a steady consciousness of Burke's characteristic merits; cold or warm, he was incapable of rising to that high level; but it is manifest that he struggled with a reluctant instinct of submission to the boldest of Burke's views, and fought up against a blind sense of Burke's authority as greater than on many accounts suited him to admit.

Even in this personal accident, as it may seem, taken in connexion with the fetters of party, lay a snare to the sobriety of Parr's understanding. The French Revolution, with him as with multitudes beside, unhinged the sanity of his moral judgments. Left to the natural influences of things, he, like many of his political friends, might have recovered a steady equilibrium of mind upon this great event, and "all which it inherited." He might have written to others, as Lady Oxford (once the most violent of democrats, but sickened by sad experience of continental frenzies) had occasion to write to him—"Of Burke's writings and principles I am now a very great admirer ; he was a great lover of practical liberty. In my days of darkness, prejudice, and folly, I never read a line of Burke ; but I am now, thank heaven, in a state of regeneration." Obstinacy, and (except by occasional starts) allegiance to his party, made this noble confession of error impossible to Dr. Parr. And the intellectual results to one who lived chiefly in the atmosphere of politics, and drew his whole animation from the fluctuations of public questions, were entirely mischievous. To those who abided by the necessities of error which grew upon any systematic opposition to Burke, the French Revolution had destroyed all the landmarks of constitutional distinctions, and impressed a character of indeterminate meaning upon ancient political principles. From that time forward, it will be seen, by those who will take the trouble to examine, that Dr. Parr, struggling (as many others did) between the obscure convictions of his conscience and the demands of his party or of his personal situation, maintained no uniform opinions at all ; gave his faith and his hopes by turns to every vagrant adventurer, foreign or domestic, military scourge or political reformer, whom the disjointed times raised into a casual notoriety ; and was consistent in nothing but in those petty speculations of philology which, growing out of his professional pursuits, served at last no end so useful as that of relieving the unamiable asperities of his fierce political partisanship.

SECTION III

How painful it is to all parties—judges or juries, government or the public in general, the culprit or his friends—when a literary man falls under the lash of the law ! How irritating to himself and others that he should be transported—how distressing that he should be hanged ! Such fates, however, befell some of Dr. Parr's dearest connexions. he lived to see his most valued pupil expatriated, in company with felons, to the land of the kangaroo and the ornithorhynchus, and he lived to accompany another friend (who also by one biographer is described as a pupil) to the foot of the gallows.<sup>1</sup>

I mention not these things by way of reproach to Dr. Parr's memory. The sufferings of his unhappy friends, after they came into trouble, called out none but the good qualities of his nature. Never, indeed, was Samuel Parr seen to greater advantage than when animating the hopes, supporting the fortitude, or ministering to the comforts, of the poor dejected prisoner in his gloomy cell, at a time when self-reproaches had united with the frowns of the world to make the consolations of friendship somewhat more than usually trying to the giver, and a thousand times more precious to the receiver. If all others forsook the wretched, and fled, Dr. Parr did not; his ear was open to the supplications of those who sat in darkness and sorrow, and, wherever the distress was real, remembering that he himself also was a poor frailty-laden human creature, he did not think it became him too severely to examine in what degrees guilt or indiscretion had concurred to that effect. Sam Parr! these things will make the earth he light upon your last abode; flowers will flourish on its verdant roof, and gleams of such remembrances extort an occasional twinge of compunction even from me—at the very moment when I am endeavouring with the gentlest of knoutings quietly to perstrunge your errors.

Sam Parr! I love you. I said so once before. But perstringing, which was a favoured word of your own, was a no less favoured act. You also in your lifetime perstringed many people, some of whom perstringed you, Sam, smartly in return; some kissed the rod, and some disdained it in silence. Complaint, therefore, on your behalf would be unreasonable; that same parresia,<sup>2</sup> which in your lifetime furnished a ground for so many thousand discharges of the same Grecian pun on your own name (each duly delivered by its elated author as the original explosion) obliges me to deal frankly with your too-frequent errors, even when I am most impressed by the spectacle of your Christian benignity. Indeed, the greater your benignity, the better is my title to tax those errors which so often defeated it. For why, let me ask of Dr. Parr's friends, should he choose to testify his friendship to men in standing by them and giving his countenance to their affliction rather than in the wiser course—so suitable to his sacred calling—of interposing his gentler counsels between their frantic designs and the dire extremities which naturally conducted to that affliction? In Gerald's case, he certainly had counselled and warned him of the precipice on which he stood, in due season. But to Gerald, as to the chamois-hunter of the Alps, danger was a temptation even for its own sake—he hungered and thirsted after political martyrdom. And it is possible that in that case Dr. Parr found no grounds of self-reproach. Possible, I say. Even here I speak doubtingly: because, if Dr. Parr applied sedatives to Gerald's fiery nature in 1794, he had certainly in 1790-92 applied stimulants; if, finally, when Mr. Pitt and the French Reign of Terror showed that no trifling could be allowed, he pulled vainly at the curb-rein (as his letters remain to show), originally it is beyond all doubt that he used the spur. Violence and intemperance, it is true, in Mr. Gerald were constitutional; yet there can be little doubt that, for the republican direction which they took, his indiscreet tutor was nearly altogether answerable.

<sup>1</sup> The references here are to (1) Joseph Gerrald, tried at Edinburgh in March 1794 for sedition, and sentenced to transportation, (2) the case of a young Mr. Olver, hanged at Stafford in 1797 for murder committed in a love-frenzy —M.

<sup>2</sup> "Parresia" (Παρρησία):—The Greek word for freedom of speech.

Joseph Gerald was a man of great talents: his defence in the Edinburgh court shows it; and I have the assurance of an able critic, who was himself present at its delivery in March 1794, that no piece of forensic eloquence on record better deserved the profound attention with which it was received. Under happier auspices than Dr. Parr's, how distinguished a citizen might this man have become!<sup>1</sup> As to Mr. Oliver, it is Dr. Parr's own statement of the case (a statement which, at this day, I presume, few persons will be found to believe) that he was condemned and executed for drinking Mr. Fox's health and reading Tom Paine's writings; in short, for being a Jacobin. The little trifling circumstance that he was also a murderer with Dr. Parr weighs nothing at all. Take, then, his own representation. Who was it that countenanced the reading of Tom Paine, criticising his infamous books as counterpoises to those of Burke, and as useful in bringing out a neutral product? Who was it that gave to Warwickshire (Mr. Olive's part of the country), nay, to all England, the one sole example of a "budge doctor,"<sup>1</sup> arrayed in the scarlet robes of the English universities, and a public instructor of the young English aristocracy, speaking cautiously and respectfully of this shallow dogmatist, who, according to his power, laid the axe to all civil government throughout the world. Who, but one man, clothed in the character of a Christian minister, could have been blinded by party violence to the extent of praising in a qualified manner, and naming amongst creditable writers, the most insolent theomachist and ruffian infidel of ancient or modern times? If Dr. Parr's friends acted upon Mr. Paine's principles, propagated Mr. Paine's principles, and suffered in public estimation, even to the extent of martyrdom, as champions of those principles, nobody can suppose that, in selecting and professing a faith so full of peril, they could be other than greatly influenced by the knowledge that a learned doctor in the Church of England, guide and tutor to themselves, had publicly spoken of that Mr. Paine as an authority not altogether without high claims to consideration.

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

But I have insensibly wandered into political considerations at a point of my review where the proper object before me was—Dr. Parr as a man of letters. For this I have some excuse, considering that politics and literature so naturally blended in Dr. Parr's practice of authorship that perhaps not one of his most scholarlike performances but is richly interveined with political allusions and sarcasms, nor again one of those most professedly political which did not often turn aside to gather flowers from the fields of the Muses, or

<sup>1</sup> "Budge doctor".—Milton's "Comus." Budge is a species of fur; furriers can best describe it. But generally the expression has the same value as when we say the ermined judge, the use of which phrase is expressly to remind the professional dignitary that we are not speaking of him in his private and extra-official capacity, when he might be entitled to play the fool according to his pleasure, but as one clothed with solemn national responsibilities, whose very costume should at every moment have recalled those responsibilities to his remembrance herbs of "medicinal power" from the gardens of philosophy. The truth is, the Doctor wrote as he lived; now bending to momentary gusts of passion; then recovering himself through cloudy glimpses to a higher standard of professional duty; remembering by fits that he was officially a teacher, spiritual and intellectual, by fits forgetting himself into a fiery partisan.

However, as I shall consider Dr. Parr's politics under a separate and peculiar head, I will, for the present, confine myself more rigorously to his literary character, difficult as it really is to observe a line of strict separation which the good Doctor himself is for ever tempting or provoking us to forget.

As a man of letters, then, what was it—what power, what accomplishment, what art—that Dr. Parr could emblazon upon his shield of pretence, as characteristically his own? Latin Latin quoad knowledge; Latin quoad practical skill. "Reading," said he, "reflection, the office of a teacher, and much practice in composition, have given me a command over the Latin sufficient for the ordinary purposes of a scholar." This was his own estimate of himself: it was modest—ostentatiously modest, and possibly he would not have made it, had he been addressing anybody but a Whig lord, taught from his earliest youth to take his valuation of Dr. Parr from a party who regarded him as their champion and martyr. Yet, again, it is not impossible that he was sincere, for the insincere will make a general profession of humility in the abstract, and yet revolt from the test of individual comparisons: they confess how much they fall short of their own ideal, but, as to John, Thomas, or William, they would spurn a claim of superiority offered for them. Now, Dr. Parr sometimes goes so far in his humility as to "name names": Sir William Jones, Sir George Baker,—these I am sure of,—and I think Bishop Lowth, were amongst the masters of Latinity to whom he somewhere concedes the palm for this accomplishment, on a question of comparison with himself. I must profess my own hearty dissent from such a graduation of the honours. Sir George Baker, from his subjects, is less generally known<sup>1</sup>. He was an Etonian, and wrote at least with facility, but medicine has a Latin of her own. As to the other two, who are within everybody's reach, I contend that, maugre their reputation, they do not write good Latin. The kind of Latin they affect is in bad taste: too florid, too rotund, too little idiomatic, its structure is vicious, and evidences an English origin. Of Lowth<sup>1</sup> I say this even more determinately than of Sir W Jones<sup>2</sup> Some day or other I shall make a great article on this subject, and I shall then illustrate largely; for, without illustration, such a discussion is as empty and aerial as a feast of the Barmecide.

<sup>1</sup> Sir George Baker, M.D., 1722-1809.—M.

Meantime, whatsoever the mechanic hounds may say who now give the tone to education, the art of writing Latin finely is a noble accomplishment, and one, I will take upon me to say, which none but a man of distinguished talent will succeed in. All the scholarship in the world will not avail to fight up against the tyranny of modern idioms and modern fashions of thought: the whole composition will continue to be redolent of lamps not fed with Roman oil, but with gas—base gas—unless in the hands of a man vigorous and agile enough to throw off the yoke of vernacular custom—

“Heavy as frost, and deep almost as life.”

No custom cramps and masters a man's freedom so effectually as the household diction which he hears from all around him. And that man who succeeds (like Dr Parr) in throwing his thoughts into ancient moulds does a greater feat than he that turned the Euphrates into a new channel for the service of his army.

This difficulty is in itself a sufficient justification of modern Latin, coupled, as it is, with so useful an activity of thought. But, apart from that, will any man contend that the establishment of a great commonwealth can be complete without artists in Latinity? Even rogues, swindlers, hangmen, are essential to the proper mounting of a great metropolis: a murderer or two, perhaps, in the complete subdivision of employments, would not be amiss in casting the parts for a full performance of social life. Assuredly, it cannot be denied that all sorts of villains, knaves, prigs, and so forth, are essential parts in the equipage of civil life. Else why do we regard police as so indispensable a function of organised society? for without corresponding objects in the way of scoundrels, sharks, crimps, pimps, ringdroppers, &c., police-officers would be idle superfluities, and liable to general disgust.

<sup>1</sup> Bishop Robert Lowth, 1710-1787.—M.

<sup>2</sup> Sir William Jones, 1746-1794 See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

But, waiving the question as stretched to this extent, for artists who work in Latin I may plead one more reason than is likely to occur in general—viz an argument applied to our just national pride. Is it not truly shameful that a great nation should have occasion to go abroad for any odd bit of Latin that it may chance to want in the way of inscription for a triumphal monument, for a tomb, for a memorial pillar, for a public or official gift? Conceding for the moment, but only for the moment, that Latin is of little other application, is it to be endured that we should be reduced to the necessity of importing our Latin secretary?<sup>1</sup> For instance, I will mention one memorable case. The Czar Alexander, as all the world knows, one fine day in the summer of that immortal year 1814, went down to Oxford, in company with our own Regent, the King of Prussia, the Hetman of the Cossacks, and a long roll of other princely personages, with titles fatiguing to the memory, and names appalling to orthography. Some were entertained at one college, some at another. The emperor's billet fell upon Merton College; and, in acknowledgment of the hospitality there shown, some time afterwards he sent to the warden and fellows, through Count Lieven, his ambassador to the Court of London, a magnificent vase of Siberian jasper. This vase wanted an inscription—a Latin inscription, of course. This inscription was to be worked in Russia, and the workmen stood resting upon their tools until this should come out from England. Now, under these circumstances, John Bull 'conceive the shame and the scandal if Oxford, the golden seat of classical erudition, under the very eyes of the Czar and his ambassador, had been obliged to resort to some coxcomb on the Continent for the small quantity of Latin required! What would Mrs Grundy have said? What would the Hetman have said? And Woronzoff, and Kutusoff, and

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

Doctoroff, and Tchitchzakoff? Indeed, I cannot think it altogether becoming to Oxford that Cambridge should have furnished the artist, for Dr Parr it was who undertook and executed the inscription, which, after all, exhibited too Spartan a nakedness to have taxed any man very severely, except for the negative quality of forbearance; and the scandal, as between the two universities, is actually on record and in print, of a chancellor of the one (Lord Grenville) corresponding with a doctor of the other, for a purpose which exclusively concerned Oxford. Perhaps the excuse may be that Oxford was not interested as a body in an affair which belonged strictly to the warden and fellows of an individual college.<sup>1</sup> And, at all events, the national part of the scandal was averted.

On this subject, which furnishes so many a heartache to a patriotic Englishman, I would beg to throw a hasty glance. John Bull, who piques himself so much and so justly on the useful and the respectable, on British industry, British faith, British hardware, British morals, British muskets (which are by no means the best specimens of our morals, judging by the proportion that annually bursts in the hands of poor savages), and, generally speaking, upon British arts, provided only they are the useful and the mechanical arts—this same John Bull has the most sheepish distrust of himself in every accomplishment that professes a purpose of ornament and mere beauty. Here he has a strong superstition in favour of names ending in ano and ini. Every foreigner, indeed, but more especially every Italian—it is John's private faith—is by privilege of nature a man of taste, and, by necessity, a knave. Were it only of music that he thought this, and only of Italian foreigners, perhaps he might not be so far amiss. Oh the barbarous leaning of British taste as regards music! Oh the trashy songs which pollute our theatres, and are allowed to steal into the very operas of Mozart! Not merely, however, in arts, technically so called, but in every branch of ornamental knowledge, everything that cannot be worked in a loom, weighed on a steelyard, measured by an ell-wand, valued by an auctioneer, John Bull secretly distrusts himself and his own powers. He may talk big when his patriotism is irritated ; but his secret and sincere opinion is that nature has made him a barbarian as regards the beautiful—if not for sensibility, at any rate for executive skill—and that, in compensation of this novel usage, fortune has given him a long purse, to buy his beauty ready-made. Hence it is, that, whilst openly disavowing it, John is for ever sneaking privately to foreigners, and tempting them with sumptuous bribes to undertake a kind of works which many scores of times would be better done by domestic talents. Latin, we may be sure, and Greek, fall too much within the description of the ornamental to be relished by John of home manufacture. Whenever, therefore, a great scholar was heard of on the Continent, him John Bull proceeded to buy or to bargain for. Many were imported at the Reformation. Joseph Scaliger was courted in the succeeding age. A younger friend of his, Isaac Casaubon, a capital scholar, but a dull man, and rather knavish, was caught. Exultingly did John hook him, play with him, and land him. James I. determined that he would have his life written by him ; and, in fact, all sorts of uses were meditated and laid out for their costly importation. But he died without doing anything that he would not have done equally well upon the Continent. The whole profit of the transaction rested with the Protestant cause ; which, but for English gold, Casaubon might ultimately have abandoned for the honours and emoluments of Rome. Cromwell himself, perfect John Bull as he was in many a nobler feature, here also preserved the national faith. He would have his martial glories recorded. Well why not ?—especially being one who had Milton at his right hand. But no ; he thought little of him—he would buy a foreigner. In fact, he was in treaty for several ; and I will venture to say that Salmasius himself was not more confounded upon finding himself suddenly seized, bound, and whirled at Milton's chariot-wheels, in a field where he was wont to career up and down as supreme and unquestioned arbiter, than Cromwell was on hearing that his own secretary, a Londoner born, and manufactured at Cambridge, had verily taken the conceit out of the vainglorious but all-learned Frenchman. It was just such another conflict as we see in "As You Like It" between

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

Orlando and the Duke's wrestler, as well for the merits of the parties as for the pleasant disappointment to the lookers-on. For even on the Continent all men rejoiced at the humiliation of Salmasius. Charles II, again, and his favourite ministers, had heard of Des Cartes as a philosopher and Latinist, but apparently not of Lord Bacon, except as a lawyer. King William, though in the age of Pearson, and Stillingfleet, and Bentley, in the very rare glances which he condescended to bestow on literature, squinted only at Grævius, Gronovius, and other Dutch professors of humanity on a ponderous scale. And, omitting scores of other cases which might be brought in illustration, even in our own day, the worthy George III, thinking it would be well to gain the imprimatur of his own pocket university of Göttingen before he made up his mind on the value of the books used in the great schools of England, despatched a huge bale of grammars, lexicons, vocabularies, elementary selections, to that most concinnous and rotund of professors, Mr. Heyne. At Cæsar's command, the professor slightly inspected them; and, having done so, in revenge of private feuds with English critics, he drew up an angry verdict on their collective merits. And thus it happened that his Majesty came to have but an indifferent opinion of English school literature. Now, in this instance we see the John Bull mania pushed to extremity. For surely Dr. Parr, on any subject whatever, barring Greek, was as competent a scholar as Master Heyne. And, on this particular subject, the jest is apparent,—that Parr was, and Heyne was not, a schoolmaster<sup>1</sup> Parr had cultivated the art of teaching all his life; and it were hard indeed if labours so tedious and heavy might not avail a man to the extent of accrediting his opinion on a capital question of his own profession. Speaking seriously, since the days of Busby, that great man who flogged so many of our avi, abavi, atavi, and tritavi,<sup>2</sup> none among the schoolmasters of Europe could, in those days, stand forward as competitors in point of scholarship with Parr. Scholars more eminent, doubtless, there had been, but not among those who wielded the ferule; for

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

<sup>2</sup> "Dr Busby! a great man, sir,—a very great man! He flogged my grandfather."—Sir Roger de Coverley

Dr. Burney of Greenwich, and Dr Butler of Shrewsbury, had not then commenced their reigns. How pointed, then, was the insult, in thus transferring the appeal from a golden critic at home to a silver one abroad ; or rather, how strong the prejudice which could prompt such an appeal to one who probably meditated no insult at all. And let no man say, on this occasion, that Parr, being a Jacobin, could not be decently consulted on the scruples of a king ; for Heyne was a Jacobin also, until Jacobinism brought danger to his windows. If the oracle at Hatton philippised, the oracle of Gottingen philippised no less, and perhaps with much less temptation, and certainly with less conspicuous neglect of his own interest. Well for him that his Jacobinism lurks in ponderous Latin notes, whilst Dr Parr's was proclaimed to the world in English !

It is fitting, then, that we people of England should always keep a man or two capable of speaking with our enemies in the gate when they speak Latin, more especially when our national honour in this particular is to be supported against a prejudice so deep, and of standing so ancient. These, however, are local arguments for cultivating Latin, and kept alive by the sense of wounded honour. But there are other considerations, more permanent and intrinsic to the question, which press equally upon all cultivated nations. The language of ancient Rome has certain indestructible claims upon our regard : it has a peculiar merit sui generis, in the first place, and, secondly, circumstances have brought it into a singular and unexampled relation to the affairs and interests of the human race.

Speaking carelessly of Latin, as one of two ancient languages, both included in the cycle of a perfect education, and which jointly compose the entire conservatory of all ancient literature that now survives, we are apt to forget that either of these languages differs from the other by any peculiar or incommunicable privilege and, for all the general advantages which can characterise a language, we rightly ascribe the preference in degree to the Greek. But there are two circumstances, one in the historical position of the Latin language, and one in its own internal character, which unite to give it an advantage in our esteem, such as no language besides (not even the Grecian) ever did, or, in the nature of things, ever can possess. They are these.—The Latin language has a planetary importance, it belongs not to this land or that land, but to all lands where the human intellect has obtained its rights and its development. It is the one sole Lingua Franca. that is, in a catholic sense, it is such for the whole humanised earth, and the total family of man. We call it a dead language. But how? It is not dead as Greek is dead, as Hebrew is dead, as Sanscrit is dead—which no man uses in its ancient form in his intercourse with other men. It is still the common dialect which binds together that great imperium in imperio—the republic of letters. And, to express in a comprehensive way the relation which this superb language bears to man and his interests, I would say that it has the same extensive and indifferent relation to our planet which the moon has amongst the heavenly bodies. Her light, and the means of intercourse which she propagates by her influence upon the tides, belong to all nations alike. How impressive a fact would it appear to us, if the great Asiatic family of nations, from Teheran, or suppose from Constantinople and Cairo (which are virtually Asiatic), to Pekin and the remotest islands on that quarter of Asia, had some one common language through which their philosophers and statesmen could communicate with each other over the whole vast floor of Asia! Yet this sublime masonic tie of brotherhood we ourselves possess, we members of Christendom, in the most absolute sense. Gradually, moreover, it is evident that we shall absorb the whole world into the progress of civilisation. Thus the Latin language is, and will be still more perfectly, a bond between the remotest places. Time also is connected by this memorable language as much as space; and periods in the history of man, too widely separated from each other (as might else have been imagined) to admit of any common tie, are, and will continue to be, brought into connexion by a vinculum so artificial (and, generally speaking, so fluctuating) as a language. This position of the Latin language, with regard to the history of man, would alone suffice to give it an overpowering interest in our regard. But, secondly, as to its intrinsic merits,—the peculiarity of its structure, and the singular powers which arise out of that structure,—I must leave that topic undiscussed. This only let me say,—that, for purposes of elaborate rhetoric, it is altogether unrivalled, the exquisitely artificial mould of its structure giving it that advantage. And, with respect to its supposed penury of words, I beg to mention the opinion of Cicero, who, in three separate passages of his works, maintains that in copiousness it has the advantage of the Greek.

Many questions arise upon the qualities of Parr's Latin in particular, and upon the general rules of style which he prescribed to himself. The far-famed author of the "Pursuits of Literature"<sup>1</sup> has stigmatised the preface to Bellendenus (we beseech you, courteous reader, to pronounce the penultimate short<sup>2</sup>—that is, lay the accent on the syllable lend) as "a cento of Latin quotations", in which judgment there is a double iniquity; for, beyond all other human performances, the "Pursuits of Literature" is a cento, and, in any fair sense, Parr's preface is not. In fact, with all its undeniable ability, all its cloudy amplifications, tortuous energy of language, and organ notes of profounder eloquence leaping at intervals through the "sound and fury" of his political vaticinations—merits which sufficed to propel that bulky satire through nearly a score of editions—yet, at this day, it cannot be denied that the "Pursuits of Literature" was disfigured by much extravagance of invective, much licence of tongue, much mean and impotent spite (see his lying attempt to retort the jest of Colman by raising a Greek dust<sup>3</sup>), but, above all (and in a degree which took all colour of decency from his sneers at Parr), by a systematic pedantry without parallel in literature. To Parr it was open, at least, to have retorted that in no instance had he left it a matter of doubt what language it was that he professed to be writing, whether it were Greek enamelled upon an English ground, or a substratum of Greek tessellated by English. That boast was something: more by a good deal than the learned satirist could pretend to. Such a mosaic as his hyper-Manippean satire was never seen by man ; unless, indeed, it were in one imitation (the "Millennium"), where the author, apparently determined to work in more colours than his master, had strewed his pages with Arabic and Persian, and actually pressed upon the particular and indulgent notice of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen in common council assembled various interesting considerations in Coptic.

<sup>1</sup> Thomas James Mathias, 1757-1835. The Pursuits of Literature appeared in 1794.—M.

<sup>2</sup> For an account of this Bellendenus see De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

<sup>3</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

By such an accuser, then, Parr could not justly be thrown upon his defence. But really, at any bar, he did not need a defence. Writing professedly as a rhetorician, he caught at the familiar commonplaces of Roman rhetoric, and golden ornaments of Ciceronian mintage, just as in English we point our perorations with the gorgeous tropes of Jeremy Taylor, relieve the austerity of our didactic speculations with the great harmonies of Milton, or lock up our sentences with massy keystones of Shaksperian sentiment. Thus far the famous Preface was no further arrayed in borrowed plumage than really became it as an avowed bravura of rhetorical art, deliberately unfolding its "dazzling fence" in passages of effect, and openly challenging admiration as a solemn agonistic effort of display and execution. What probably misled the unfriendly critic were the continued references in the margin to Cicero, or other masters of Latinity. But these were often no acknowledgments for obligations, but simply sanctions for particular uses of words, or for questionable forms of phraseology. In this Dr. Parr was even generous ; for, though he did sometimes leave traps for the unwary—and thus he acknowledged with a chuckling laugh—still, in many more instances, he saved them from the snares which were offered by these suspicious cases in Latinity.

Dismissing, however, in his own contemptuous words this false and malicious exception to Dr. Parr's preface,—"Quare suo, per me licet, sale nigro u delectentur, suæque superbæ morem gerant, qui me dictitant, veluti quendam ludimagistrum, ex alienis orationibus librum meum composuisse"—it is very possible that there may be others with better foundation. Amongst these there is one which I have heard most frequently pressed in conversation, and it is connected with a quæstio vexatissima on the general principles of modern Latin diction : was not the style hybrid—that is, a composite style, owned by no one age in particular, but made up by inharmonious contributions from many? I answer firmly—No. Words there are, undoubtedly—single words, and solitary phrases, and still oftener senses and acceptations of words—which can plead no Ciceronian authority.<sup>1</sup> But the mould—the structure—the τύπος of the sentence, that is always Roman, always such as Cicero would have understood and countenanced. Nay, many passages there are which Cicero could not have beat for his ears. Every sentence or period moves upon two principal determinations: its external connexion in the first place—how does it arise, upon what movement of the logic or the feeling from the preceding period? and, secondly, its own internal evolution. These moments (to speak dynamically) in the construction of sentences according to their treatment (but, above all, in a language the most exquisitely artificial that human necessities have created) become the very finest tests of their idiomatic propriety. In the management of these primary elements in the art of composition, Parr is a master. As to words, or separable parts, which a stroke of the pen can remove and supply, the effect, upon the whole, is little, and to modern ears, untrained by colloquial use to apprehend spontaneously the discordant association of archaisms and neologisms, scarcely any at all. Yet, it is observable that to words only, and single phrases, the purists in Latin composition have most unwisely directed their attention.

Above all, the Ciceronian purists were famous in their day: a volume might be written on their history. Fierce sectarianism bred fierce latitudinarianism. Was a writer Ciceronian in his words and phrases? That, for some critics, was the one demand. On the other hand, many piqued themselves on throwing off a restriction so severe, and for certain subjects so disadvantageous. Some valued themselves on writing like Tacitus; some, with larger and more natural taste, like Livy. Some even were content with a model as modern as Lipsius or Strada<sup>2</sup>

In such disputes all turns upon the particular purpose

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M

<sup>2</sup> Justus Lipsius, 1547-1606, Famianus Strada, 1572-1649.—M.

which a writer has in using the Latin idiom. Why, on what considerations, honouring what old prescriptive usage, or looking to what benefit, has an author used Latin at all? For, evidently, in forgoing his own mother tongue, he has wilfully forfeited much ease and some power. His motives, therefore, must be very determinate in a choice so little for his own immediate interest. If,—which is the commonest case,—he writes Latin merely as a Lingua Franca, as the general language of the literary commonwealth of Christendom, and, therefore, purely to create an extended circulation for his thoughts, it is probable that his subject in these days will be derived from some branch of science, or, at all events, some theme treated didactically; for, as an orator, an essayist, or, generally, as a bellettrist, he can find no particular temptations in a language which, whilst it multiplies his difficulties, must naturally limit his audience. On a mere calculation of good sense, we may predict that his subject will, in nine cases out of ten, be one which is paramount, by its matter, to all considerations of style and manner. Physics, for example, in some one of its numerous branches; mathematics, or some great standing problem of metaphysics. Now, in such a case, if there be one rule of good taste more pressing than another, it is this: to reject all ornaments of style whatever—in fact all style; for, unless on a question which admits some action of the feelings, in a business of the pure understanding, style, properly defined, is impossible. Consequently, classical Latin, whether of the golden, silver, or brazen age, is, in such a case, equally to be rejected.

Why is it that in law Latin we say murdrunt, for he murdered—warrantizo, homagnum, and so forth? Simply because the transcendent matter in all legal discussions, the great interests of life and property which law concerns, the overruling importance of the necessities to which law ministers, making intelligibility and distinction of cases to be the absorbing consideration, cannot but throw into the shade every quality of writing which does not co-operate to that end; and, for those qualities which have a tendency even to clash with it, cannot but reduce them to the rank of puerile levities. The idea of felony, under its severe and exclusive limitation, according to our jurisprudence, could not be adequately reached by any Ciceronian term whatsoever; and, this once admitted, it is evident that the filigree frost-work of classical fastidiousness must be allowed to melt at once before the great domineering influences of life in its elementary interests. Religion again, how much has that been found to suffer in the hauds of classical precisians, to whom the whole vocabulary of Christianity—all the technical terms of its divine economy, all its idioms, such as grace, sanctification, sacrament, regeneration, &c — were so many stones of offence and scandal as regarded the terms, even where they did not reject the conceptions. Now, one law of good sense is paramount for all composition whatsoever—viz that the subject, the very ideas, for the development of which only any composition at all became necessary, must not suffer prejudice, or diminution, from any scruples affecting the mere accessories of style or manner. Where both cannot co-exist, perish the style—let the subject-matter (to use a scholastic term) prosper!<sup>1</sup>

This law governs every theme of pure science, or which is capable of a didactic treatment. For instance, in natural philosophy, where the mere ideas under discussion, the bodies, the processes, the experiments, the instruments, are all alike almost in a region unknown and unsubjected to any jurisdiction of the classical languages, how vain, how puerile the attempt to fight up against these natural, and for us insurmountable, difficulties, by any system of clever equivocations, or ingenious compromises between the absolute barbarisms of the thing and their nearest classical analogies. By such misdirected sleight-of-hand what is effected? We sacrifice one principle, without propitiating the other. Science, defrauded of her exactness, frowns; and the genius of classical elegance does not smile. Precision is wilfully forfeited; and no real ornament is gained. Wheresoever a man writes not for a didactic purpose, but for effect, —wheresoever the composition is not a mere means for conveying truths, but its own end and final object as a power,—there only it may be allowable to attempt a happy evasion of some modern barbarism by means of its nearest Roman equivalent. For example, in a sepulchral inscription, one of the finest modes of the serious epigram, where distinction for the understanding is nothing, and effect for the natural sensibilities is all in all, Dr. Parr might be justified in saying that a man died by a ballista, as the nearest classical weapon of offence to that which was really concerned in the fatal accident. But the same writer, treating any question of natural philosophy, could never have allowed himself in so vague a term. To know that a man perished under a blow from some engine of war acted on by a mechanical force, without distinguishing whether gun or pistol, bomb, mortar, howitzer, or hand-grenade, might be all that was required to engage the reader's sympathy. Some little circumstantiality, some slight specification of details, is useful in giving direction and liveliness to a general tone of commiseration; whilst too minute an individualisation of objects, not elevated enough to sustain any weight of attention, would both degrade the subject and disturb the natural current of the feelings, by the disproportionate notice it would arrogate under the unwieldy periphrasis that might be necessary to express it. But, on the other hand, in pure physics, the primary necessity of rigorous distinction would demand an exact designation of the particular implement; size, weight, bore, mode of action, and quantity of resistance, might here all happen to be of foremost importance. Something, in fact, analogous to all this, for the case itself, and for the law which it suggests, may be found in the art of gardening, under its two great divisions of the useful and the ornamental. Taste was first applied to the latter. From the art of gardening, as cultivated for picturesque effects, laws and principles of harmonious grouping, of happy contrast, and of hidden co-operation in parts remote from each other, were soon derived. It was natural that some transfer should be attempted of these rules to the humbler province of kitchen-gardens. Something was tried here, also, of the former devices for producing the picturesque; and the effects were uniformly bad. Upon which two classes of critics arose: one who supposed kitchen-gardens to be placed altogether out of the jurisdiction of taste; and another, who persisted in bringing them within it, but unfortunately by means of the very same rules as those which governed the larger and more irregular province of pleasure-gardens. The truth lay between the two parties. The last were right in supposing that every mode of exhibiting objects to the eye had its own susceptibilities (however limited) of beauty, and its own rules of good taste. The first, on the other hand, were equally right in rejecting the rules of the picturesque as applicable to arrangements in which utility and convenience presided. Beauty, "wild without rule or art, enormous bliss" (that is, bliss which transcends all norma, or artificial regulation), which is Milton's emphatic summing up of the luxuries of Eden, obeys a much wider law, and in that proportion more difficult to be abstracted than the elegance of trim arrangement. But even this has its own appropriate law of ornament; and the mistake is to seek it by translation from some province differing essentially, and by its central principle, from itself. Where it is possible (as in ornamental gardening on the English plan it is) to appear as an assistant, and in subordination to nature, making her the principal artist, and rather directing her efforts than positively interfering with them, there it is certain that the wild, the irregular, the illimitable, and the luxuriant, have their appropriate force of beauty; and the tendency of art is no more than simply to assist their development, and to sustain their effect, by removing whatever is inharmonious. But, in a system of which utility is the object, utility must also be the law and source of the beauty. That same convenience which dictates arrangement and limitation as its own subsidiary instruments ought to dictate these same principles as the presiding agents for the creation of appropriate ornaments. Instead of seeking a wild picturesque, which delights in concealing, or in revealing only by fits, the subtle and half-evanescent laws under which it grows, good taste suggests imperatively, as the object we should court, a beauty of the architectural kind, courting order and symmetry, avowing, not hiding, its own artifices, and absolutely existing by correspondence of parts.

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

Latin composition falls into the same or analogous divisions, and these divisions obey the same or corresponding rules. The highest form of Latin composition,—ornamented

Latin, which belongs to a difficult department of the higher belles lettres,—clothes itself, by natural right, in the whole pomp and luxury of the native Roman idiom. Didactic Latin of any class, in which the subject makes it impossible to sustain that idiom for two consecutive sentences, abandons it professedly, and creates a new law for itself. Even the art of annotation, a very extensive branch of purely didactic Latin, and cultivated by immense numbers of very able men, has its own peculiar laws and proprieties, which must be sought in the works of those who have practised it with success<sup>1</sup>

For an example in support of what I have been saying, and illustrating the ludicrous effect which arises from a fastidiously classical phraseology employed upon a subject of science, I might refer my readers to the collection of letters between Leibnitz and various correspondents in different parts of Europe, published at Hanover by Feder, among which are some extra superfine letters by a certain Italian abbé.

It is really as good as a comedy to see the rope-dancing tricks of agility by which this finical Italian petit-maitre contrives to talk of electricity, retorts, crucibles, and gas, in terms that might have delighted the most delicate ears of Augustan Rome. Leibnitz pays him some compliments, as he could do no less, upon his superfine apparel; but evidently he is laughing in his sleeve at the hyperbolical pains and perspiration that each paragraph of his letters must have cost him. This Italian simply carried a pretty common mistake to a ridiculous excess. The notion is universal that, even in writing upon scientific subjects, it is right to strive after classical grace in that extent to which it shall be found attainable. But this is false taste. Far juster, better, and more self-consistent, is the plain, unpretending Latin of the great heroes of philosophy—Lord Bacon, Des Cartes, and Leibnitz.<sup>2</sup> They court no classical ornaments, no rhetorical phrases; yet the Latin idiom, though not studiously courted, is never harshly violated. Philosophic ideas, philosophic dogmas, of modern birth, are not antedated by giving them Pagan names. Terms of modern science, objects of modern discovery, are not disguised in a ridiculous masquerade of classical approximations, presenting a conjectural travesty, rather than a just and responsible translation by fair equivalents. The interests of the sense, and the demands of the primary purpose, are everywhere made the governing considerations, and, whilst the barbarisms of some amongst the schoolmen are never imitated, and no idioms positively modern are adopted, the pure Roman idiom is only so far courted as it favours the ends of expedition and precision. In short, I shall not much err in making this general assertion,—that a philosophic Latin style, suited to the wants of modern speculation and modern research, has gradually matured itself in the hands of the great philosophic reformers: an ancient language has bent to the pressure of new circumstances, and of modern revolutions in thinking; and it might be shown that it has, in fact, thrown off a new and secondary idiom, neither modern nor antique, and better fitted for despatch, though less showy, than that of ancient Rome; and this secondary idiom has been created in the same way, and by the same legitimate agency, as any language whatsoever—viz. by the instincts of feeling, and the necessities of the human mind. Voluntarily and consciously, man never did, nor could, create a language.

<sup>1</sup> Amongst whom, by the way, Bentley stands foremost, whilst Porson is the least felicitous in giving a scholar-like expression to his notes

<sup>2</sup> See De Quincey's two Appended Notes to this page —M.

The great men I speak of, as all men engaged in that function, were controlled by circumstances existing out of themselves—viz. the demands of human thinking, as they have gradually been unfolded, and the needs of experimental philosophy. In maturing their product, that neutral diction of philosophy which is neither modern nor ancient, they were themselves controlled by the circumstances I state; yet, again, as they started with a scholar-like knowledge of the ancient Roman idiom, they have reciprocally so far reacted upon these circumstances, and controlled their natural tendency, as not to suffer their own vernacular idioms to impress themselves upon their new diction, or at all to mould its shape and character.

Into these discursive notices I have allowed myself to wander, from the interest which attaches to every phasis of so imperishable a monument of Roman power as survives for all cultivated nations in the Roman language, and also from its near connexion with my immediate subject. Recalling myself, however, into that branch of my theme which more particularly concerns Dr. Parr, who wrote little (if anything) in the neutral or didactic form of the Latin idiom, but came forward boldly as a performer on the great classical organ of that majestic language—I have said that, in my judgment, he was a skilful performer; I will add that, notwithstanding his self-depreciation, possibly not sincere, he was much more skilful than those who have been most accredited for this accomplishment in modern England; particularly he was superior, as a master of Latinity, to Sir William Jones and Bishop Lowth, the two most celebrated English composers in Latin through the latter half of the eighteenth century.

Whilst thus limiting my comparison of Parr to English competitors for the same sort of fame, I am reminded that Reiske, the well-known editor of the Greek Orators,<sup>1</sup> a hasty and careless but a copious scholar, and himself possessing a fluent command over the Latin language, has pronounced a general censure (preface to Demosthenes) of English Latinity. In this censure, after making the requisite limitations, I confess that reluctantly I concur. Not that the Continent does not keep us in countenance by its own breed of bald composers, but our English deficiencies are the more remarkable when placed in collision with the unquestionable fact that in no country upon earth have the gentry, both professional and non-professional, and the majority even of the higher aristocracy, so large a tincture of classical knowledge. What is still more remarkable, some of our first-rate scholars have been our poorest masters of Latinity. In particular, Taylor, the civilian,<sup>2</sup> and, forensically speaking, the able editor of Demosthenes,<sup>3</sup> whose style it was, to the best of my remembrance, in connexion with some ill-natured sneer at Wolff, that furnished the immediate provocation to Reiske's remark, wrote meanly in Latin ; and Porson, a much greater scholar than any of these men,<sup>1</sup> was, as a Latinist, below the meanest of them. In fact, he wrote Latin of any kind—such Latin even as was framed on his own poor ideal—with singular want of freedom and facility : so much may be read in the very movement of his disjointed style. But (more than all that) his standard and conception of Latin style were originally bad, and misdirected. A compass so wide as that of Parr was far beyond Porson's strength of pinion. He has not ventured, in any instance that I am aware of, to trust himself through the length of three sentences to his own impulses, but, in his uniform character of annotator, timidly creeps along shore, attached to the tow-line of his text, and ready to drop his anchor on the least summons to stretch out to sea. In this, however, there is something equivocal : timidity of thinking may perhaps be as much concerned in his extreme reserve as penury of diction. In reality, the one mortal taint of English Latinity is, that it is a translation, a rendering back, from an English archetype. In that way, and upon any such a principle, good Latin never can arise. It grows up by another process. To write like an ancient Roman, a man must think in Latin. From its English shape, the thoughts, the connexions, the transitions, have already received a determination this way or that, unfitting them for the yoke of a Latin construction. Even the most absolute fixtures (to use that term) in an English structure must often be unsettled, and the whole framework of the period be taken to pieces and recast in a thoroughly Latin composition. The interrogative form must often be changed to the absolute affirmative, and versâ vice ; parenthetical intercalations must often be melted down into the body of the sentence ; qualifications and restraints added or omitted ; and the whole thought, its succession and connexion, altered, before it will be fitted to receive a direct Latin character.

<sup>1</sup> J. J. Reiske, 1716-1774.—M.

<sup>2</sup> “Civilian” —The ridiculous abuse of this word civilian in our days obliges me to explain that I mean by civilian one of three separate characters —1. the student, 2. the teacher or professor, 3. the forensic practiser, of the civil (or Roman) law.

<sup>3</sup> John Taylor, LL D., 1704-1766.—M.

This part of my subject, and, in connexion with it, Dr. Parr's singular command of the Latin idiom, I might easily illustrate by a few references to the Bellenden Preface ; and there is the more propriety in a studious use of this preface because Parr himself declared to one of his friends (Dr. Johnstone's Memoirs, p 263), "There are in the preface almost all the phraseological beauties I know of in Latin."

<sup>1</sup> Richard Porson, 1759-1808. —M

But this task belongs to a separate paper on modern Latinity. At present I hasten to a class of the Doctor's Latin compositions in which his merits are more conspicuous—because more characteristically his own.

In the EPITAPHS of Dr. Parr, as amongst the epitaphs of this country, where a false model has prevailed—the lapidary style and arrangement, and an unseasonable glitter of rhetoric—there is, in one direction, almost a unique body of excellence. Indeed, from these inscriptions I believe it possible to abstract all the negative laws which should preside in this species of composition. The defect—a heavy defect—is in the positive qualities. Whatsoever an epitaph ought not to be, that too frequently it is, and, by examining Dr Parr's in detail, we shall find, from the uniformity of his abstinence in those circumstances which most usually offer the matter of offence, that his abstinence was not accidental, and that implicitly—that is, by involution and silent implication—all the canons of a just theory on this branch of art are there brought together and accumulated. This is no light merit; indeed, when one reflects upon it, and considers how many and how able men have failed, I begin to think that Sam was perhaps a greater man by the intention of nature than my villainous prejudices have allowed me to suppose. But, with this concession to the negative merits of the Doctor, let it not be thought illiberal in me to connect a repetition of my complaint as to the defects of the τὸ affirmative in this collection. Every art is there illustrated which can minister to the gratification of the judgment. the grand defect is in all that should affect the sensibility. It is not enough in an epitaph that it does not shock or revolt my taste or sense of propriety—of decorum—and the convenances arising out of place, purpose, occasion, or personal circumstances. The absence of all this leaves me in the condition for being suitably affected: I am ready to be affected; and I now look for the τὸ positive which is to affect me. Everything has been removed by the skilful hand of the composer which could interfere with, or disturb, the sanctity or tenderness of my emotions: "And now then," the ground being cleared, "why don't you proceed to use your powers of pathos?" The Grecian epigrammata—that matchless bead-roll of tender expressions for all household feelings that could blossom amongst those for whom no steady dawn of celestial hopes had risen—that treasury of fine sentiment, where the natural pieties of the human heart have ascended as high as a religion so meagre could avail to carry them—do not rely for their effect merely upon the chastities of their composition. Those graces act simply in the way of resistance to all adverse forces, but their absolute powers lie in the frank language of natural grief, trusting to its own least elaborate expression, or in the delicacies of covert and circumstantial allusion. Of this latter kind we have occasionally an example in Dr Parr himself. When he numbers, not the years only, and months, but the hours, even, of a young man's life, he throws the attention indirectly on the affecting brevity of his career, and on the avaricious love in the survivors clinging tenaciously to the record of his too fugitive hours, even in their minutest fractions. Applied to elder persons, this becomes too much of a mechanical artifice. But the pointed expression, by any means or artifice whatever, of the passions suited to the occasion, is far too rare in the Parrian inscriptions. One might suppose even that pious grief and tender desiderium, the final cause and the efficient cause at once of epitaphs, were, in Dr Parr's estimate, no more than a lucro ponamus, something indifferent to their essence, and thrown in casually as a bonus beyond what we are entitled to expect.

Meantime, allowing for this one capital defect, all the laws of good composition, and of Latin composition in particular, are generally observed by Dr. Parr. In particular, he objected, and I think judiciously, to the employment of direct quotations in an epitaph. He did not give his reasons; perhaps he only felt them. On a proper occasion, I fancy that I could develop these reasons. At present it is sufficient to say that quotations always express a mind not fully possessed by its subject, and abate the tone of earnestness which ought to preside either in very passionate or in very severe composition. A great poet of our own days, in writing an ode, felt that a phrase which he had borrowed ought not to be marked as a quotation, for that this reference to a book had the effect of breaking the current of the passion.<sup>1</sup> In the choice of his Latinity, also, Dr. Parr prescribed to himself, for this department of composition, very peculiar and very refined maxims. The guide whom he chiefly followed was one not easily obtained for love or money,—Morcellus de Stylo Inscriptionum. Yet sometimes he seems to have forgotten his own principles. An epitaph was sent for his approbation, written by no less a person than Louis XVIII. All the world is aware that this prince was a man of cultivated taste, and a good classical scholar, and, in particular, minutely acquainted with Horace. The prince was, however, for such a task, something too much of a Catholic bigot, and he disfigured his epitaph by introducing the most unclassical Latinity of the Vulgate. Nevertheless, Dr. Parr thought proper to approve of this. Now I admit, and the spirit of my remarks already made on the Latinity for scientific subjects will have shown that I admit, cases in which classical Latin must systematically bend to modern modifications. I admit, also, that the Vulgate translation, from the sanctity of its authority in the Romish Church, comes within the privileged class of cases which have created a secondary order of Latinity, deserving to be held classical in its own proper jurisdiction. Sepulchral inscriptions for Christian countries being usually in churches, or their consecrated purlieus, may be thought by some to fall peculiarly within that line. But I say—No. It would be so, were the custom of monumental inscription wholly, or in its first origin, a religious one; whereas epitaphs are primarily a matter of usage and sentiment, not at all prescribed by religion, but simply checked and modified by the consecrated place in which they are usually sculptured, and by the religious considerations associated with the contemplation of death. This is my opinion, and ought to be Dr. Parr's; for, in writing to Sir Joshua Reynolds on the subject of an epitaph for Dr Johnson, amongst other judicious reflections upon the general subject of Latin inscriptions, he says, "If Latin is to be the language, the whole spirit and the whole phraseology ought to be such as a Latin writer would use." Now, the Vulgate translation of the Scriptures would have been nearly unintelligible in the ages of classic Rome, and nowhere more so than in that particular passage which fell under Dr Parr's examination.

<sup>1</sup> This poet was Wordsworth; the particular case arose in the "Ode on the Intimations of Immortality"; and I will mention frankly that it was upon my own suggestion that this secondary and revised view was adopted by the poet.

The laws of the Epitaph, a peculiar and most interesting branch of monumental inscription, and the modification of these laws as applied to Christian cemeteries, present a most attractive subject to the philosopher and the man of taste in conjunction. I shall relegate the inquirer to an essay on this subject by Wordsworth, the sole even tentative approximation which I know towards a philosophic valuation of epitaphs upon fixed principles. His essay is beautifully written, and finely conceived<sup>1</sup>. The central principle of an epitaph he states thus (I do not pretend to quote, speaking from a recollection of many years back):—It expresses, or ought to express, the most absolute synthesis of the generic with the individual: that is to say, starting from what a man has in common with all his species, the most general affections of frail humanity—its sufferings and its pleasures, its trials and triumphs, its fears and awful hopes—starting from this as the indispensable ground of all general sympathy, it goes forward to what a man has most peculiar and exclusive to himself—his talents and their special application, his fortunes, and all the other incommunicable circumstances of his life, as the ground for challenging a separate and peculiar attention. The first element of an epitaph claims the benefit of participation in a catholic interest; the second claims it in that peculiar degree which justifies a separate and peculiar record. This most general idea of an epitaph, or sepulchral inscription, which is valid for all religions, falls in especially with the characteristic humility of the Christian. However distinguished amongst his earthly peers, yet, in the presence of that Being whose infinity confounds all earthly distinctions, every man is bound to remember, in the first place, those great bonds of a common mortality—a common frailty—and a common hope, which connect him with the populous “nations of the grave” His greatest humiliation, but also his most absolute glory, lies in that mysterious incarnation of an infinite spirit in a fleshly robe which makes him heir to the calamities of the one, but also co-heir to the imperishable dowry of the other. As the basis, therefore, of any interest which can connect him with the passing reader, and as an introductory propitiation also to the Christian genus loci, he begins by avowing his humanity—his absolute identity with what is highest and lowest, wisest and simplest, proudest and meanest, in all around him

<sup>1</sup> Wordsworth's Essay upon Epitaphs. originally furnished to Coleridge in 1810 for his Lake periodical called The Friend, and afterwards printed by Wordsworth among his Notes to his Poems
—M

This principle must preside in every epitaph alike There is another equally important which should govern the conclusion ; and, like that which I have just been urging, as, on the one hand, it is prompted by universal good taste, and therefore claimed its rights even under a Pagan mythology, so, on the other, it lends itself, with a peculiar emphasis, to the characteristic tone of a Christian epitaph. It is this.—We may observe that poets of the highest class, whether otherwise delighting or not in the storm and tumultuous agitation of passion, whether otherwise tragic or epic in the constitution of their minds, yet, by a natural instinct, have all agreed in tending to peace and absolute repose, as the state in which only a sane constitution of feelings can finally acquiesce. And hence, even in those cases where the very circumstances forbade the absolute tranquillity of happiness and triumphant enjoyment, they have combined to substitute a secondary one of resignation. This may be one reason why Homer has closed his chief poem with the funeral rites of Hector. a section of the “Iliad” which otherwise has appeared to many an excrescence Perhaps he was unwilling to leave us with the painful spectacle of the noble and patriotic martyr dragged with ruffian violence round the funeral pyre of Patroclus, the coming desolation of Troy in prospect, the frenzy of grief in its first tempestuous career amongst the Trojan women and children, and the agitations of sympathy in the reader as yet untroubled. A final book, therefore, removes all these stormy objects, leaving the stage in possession of calmer objects, and of emotions more elevating, tranquillising, and soothing :—

“ Ως οἷγ’ ἀμφίεπον τάφον Ἑκτορος ἵπποδάμοιο ”

“So tended they the grave [ministered to the obsequies] of Hector, the tamer of horses.”

Or, to give it with the effect of Pope’s rhythmus—

“Such honours Ilium to her hero paid ;
And peaceful slept the mighty Hector’s shade ”

In one sense, indeed, and for that peculiar auditory whom Homer might contemplate—an auditory sure to merge the universal sense of humanity in the local sense of Grecian nationality—the very calamities of Troy and her great champion were so many triumphs for Greece ; and, in that view, it might be contended that the true point of repose is the final and absolute victory of Achilles, upon which supposition the last book really is an excrescence, or at least a sweeping ceremonial train to the voluminous draperies of the “Iliad,” in compliance with the religious usages of ancient Greece. But it is probable that my own view of the case is more correct ; for there is other and independent evidence that Homer himself was catholic enough in his sensibilities to sympathise powerfully with Hector and Priam, and means his hearers to do so. Placing himself, therefore, at least for the occasion, in the neutral position of a modern reader whose sympathies are equally engaged for Greece and for Troy, he felt the death of Hector as an afflicting event, and the attending circumstances more as agitating than as triumphant, and added the last book as necessary to regain the key of a disturbed equanimity. In “Paradise Lost,” again, this principle is still more distinctly recognised, and is practically applied to the case by an artifice even more elaborate. There the misery, the anguish, at one point of the action—the despair—are absolute, nor does it appear at first sight how, or by what possibility, the reader can repossess himself of the peace and fortitude which even the sullen midnight of Tragedy requires, much more the large sunlight of the Epopee. Paradise was lost ; that idea ruled and domineered in the very title ; how was it to be withdrawn, or even palliated, in the conclusion ? Simply thus :—If Paradise were lost, Paradise was also regained ; and though that reconquest could not, as an event, enter into the poem without breaking its unity in a flagrant manner, yet, proleptically, and in the way of vision, it might. Such a vision is placed by the archangelic comforter before Adam ; purged with euphrasy and rue, his eye beholds it, and, for that part which cannot artistically be given as a visionary spectacle, the angel interposes as a solemn narrator and interpreter. The consolations which in this way reach Adam reach the reader no less ; and the reader is able to unite with our general father in his thankful acknowledgment :—

“Greatly instructed shall I hence depart, Greatly in peace of mind”

Accordingly, spite of the triumphs of Satan—spite of Sin and all-conquering Death, who had left the gates of Hell for their long abode on Earth—spite of the pollution, wretchedness, and remorse, that had now gained possession of man—spite of the far-stretching taint of that contagion which (in the impressive instances of the eagle and the lion) too evidently showed itself by “mute signs” as having already seasoned for corruption earth and its inheritance<sup>1</sup>—yet, by means of this one sublime artifice, which brings together the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and end of time, the last day of man’s innocence and the first of his restoration, it is contrived that a twofold peace—the peace of resignation and the peace of hope—should harmonise the key in which the departing strains of this celestial poem roll off, and its last cadences leave behind an echo, which, with the solemnity of the grave, has also the halcyon peace of the grave, and its austere repose. A third instance we have—even more direct and unequivocal, of the same principle, from this same poet, not only involved silently in his practice, but also consciously contemplated. In the “Samson Agonistes,” though a tragedy of most tumultuous catastrophe, it is so contrived, by the interposition of the chorus, who, fixing their hopes in the heavens, are unshaken by sublunary griefs, not only that all should terminate

<sup>1</sup> See the fine incidents (Paradise Lost, Book XI) of the earliest hostility among animals, which first announce to Adam the immeasurable extent of his own ruin.

“In peace of spirit and sublime repose,”

but also that this conclusion should be expressly drawn out in words as the great moral of the drama ; by which, as by other features, it recalls, in its most exquisite form, the Grecian model which it follows, together with that fine transfiguration of moral purpose that belongs to a higher, purer, and far holier religion.

Peace, then, severe tranquillity, the brooding calm, or γαλήνη of the Greeks, is the final key into which all the storms of passion modulate themselves in the hands of great poets

“In war itself—war is no ultimate end.”<sup>1</sup>

All tumult is for the sake of rest—tempest, but the harbinger of calm—and suffering, good only as the condition of permanent repose. Peace, in a double sense, may be supposed inscribed on the portals of all cemeteries: that peace, in the first place, which belongs to the grave as the final haven after the storms of life—and in this sense the sentiment belongs equally to the Pagan, the Mahometan, and the Christian ; secondly, the peace of resignation to the will of God, in the meek surrender at his call of those on whom our profoundest affections had settled. This sentiment belongs pre-eminently, if not exclusively, to Christianity, is known, I presume, in some sense, to the Mahometan, but not at all to the Pagan. And this it is in which Christian epitaphs should terminate. Hence it is peculiarly offensive to a just taste, were no higher principle offended, that despair—or obstinate refusal of consolation—should colour the expression of an epitaph. The example which (if I remember rightly) Wordsworth alleges of this capital fault, is from the famous monument erected by Sir Brooke Boothby, a Derbyshire baronet, to his only daughter, a very beautiful and intellectual child, about eight years old. The closing words of the inscription are to this effect.—“The wretched parents embarked their all upon this frail bark, and the wreck was total” Here there are three gross faults—first, it is an expression of rebellious grief, courting despair, and within the very walls of a Christian church abjuring hope; secondly, as a movement of violent passion, it is transient—Despair cannot long sustain itself; hence it is pointedly out of harmony with the durability of a marble record—How puerile to sculpture laboriously with the chisel, and thus invest with a monumental eternity, any sentiment whatever which must already have begun to fade before the sculptor has finished his task! Thirdly, this vicious sentiment is expressed figuratively—that is, fancifully—Now, all action of the fancy is out of place in a sepulchral record—No sentiment is there appropriate except the weightiest, sternest, and most elementary, no expression of it except the simplest and severest

<sup>1</sup> Coleridge's Wallenstein.

“Calm passions there abide, majestic pains”

These great laws of feeling, in this difficult and delicate department of composition, though perhaps never contemplated distinctly as laws by Dr Parr, yet seem to have been impulsively obeyed by many of his epitaphs. And, with regard to the expressions of his thoughts, except to the extent of a single word—as, for instance, vehficari, in which the metaphorical application has almost obliterated the original meaning—I remember nothing figurative, nothing too gay, nothing luxuriant,—all is chaste, grave—suited to the solemnity of the situation—Had Dr. Parr, therefore, written under the additional restraints connected with the additional powers of verse, and had he oftener achieved a distinguished success in the pathetic, he would, as an artist in monumental inscriptions, have held a place amongst the highest class.<sup>1</sup> Meantime, his merits are the less memorable, or likely to leave an impression on our literature, that they are almost invariably negative; painfully evading faults which are not known or suspected as faults by most readers, and resisting temptations to rhetorical displays that, even if freely indulged, would for the multitude have had a peculiar fascination.

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

SECTION IV

ABOUT the year 1789 Dr. Parr was involved in two literary broils. the one purely aggressive on his part, the other nearly so; though, as usual, the Doctor coloured them to his own mind as measures of just retaliation. The first arose in his wanton republication of a pamphlet, written by Bishop Warburton,<sup>1</sup> but afterwards suppressed by his orders; and to this pamphlet he united another, "by a Warburtonian," meaning Bishop Hurd<sup>2</sup>, prefixing to the whole a preface, and a most rhetorical dedication, from his own pen, in which he labours to characterise both the bishops, but especially the living one, in terms that, whilst wearing some show of justice, should also be as sarcastic and as injurious as possible. The mere act of reviving what the authors themselves had been painfully anxious to suppress is already sufficiently offensive, and expressive of a spiteful mind, had the preface even been spared. What was the provocation to a piece of mischief so puerile? Listen to the Doctor, and you will suppose that no motive but the purest and most philanthropic had governed him. Leland and Jortin, two dissenting clergymen, respectably learned as regarded the amount of their learning, and usefully learned as regarded its application<sup>3</sup>;—these men had, by the Bishop of Gloucester (Warburton), and by his sycophant, the Bishop of Worcester (Hurd), as Parr alleged, been cruelly undervalued. Leland had been "most petulantly insulted, and Jortin most inhumanly vilified." Well—and what then? Better men than ever stood upon their pins have been insulted, hustled, floored, smashed, and robbed. Besides, hard words break no bones. And why could not the two dissenters have settled their own quarrels with the two bishops? In effect, they had done so. Why must Dr. Parr intrude his person into the row, long after it was extinct, and when three out of four parties nominally interested were in their graves? Oh, but, says Dr. Parr, the example was the thing; neither of the offenders had been punished ; and their impunity, if tolerated, would encourage future bishops to future assaults upon future dissenters, when future Parrs for redressing the wrong might not be at hand. He was resolved to deter others from supposing "that what has been repeatedly and deliberately done in secret will not, sooner or later, be punished openly." Finally, coming nearer to the true purpose of the whole, he avows that "it was intended to lessen the number of those who speak too well of Bishop Hurd "

<sup>1</sup> Warburton, 1698-1779.—M

<sup>2</sup> Hurd, 1720-1808.—M

<sup>3</sup> John Leland, D.D., 1691-1766, John Jortin, D.D., 1698-1770.—M.

Vain and tortuous disguises of malice self-betrayed ! Now, let us hear the true lurking motives to this almost unprincipled attack, which Dr Parr so studiously masked under pretexts of public purposes. One writer tells us that Parr, on a visit to Hartlebury (the Bishop of Worcester's villa), had been dismissed with little ceremony, and with hospitable attentions either none at all, or so chilling as to pique his pride. This anecdote, however, I have reason to think, refers to a period subsequent to the original offence. Perhaps that offence might arise in a case where the bishop drew upon himself the ferocious resentment of Parr by hesitation in passing one of Parr's friends, then a candidate for holy orders. Even this resentment, however, was possibly no more than the first expression of Parr's secret mortification at the bishop's private opinion of his sermon on education. Nothing in this world travels faster than the ill-natured judgments of literary men upon each other ; and Parr probably heard from a thousand quarters that Hurd had expressed his dislike to the style, or the preposterous length of this "vernacular sermon." That this anecdote is true nobody doubts who remembers the pointed manner in which Parr himself notices, in his dedication, Bishop Hurd's "rooted antipathy to long vernacular sermons from Dr. Parr "

Of such quality are often the true motives even of good men, when their personal feelings are roused. The whole pretence of Parr was a fiction. Jortin and Leland were already avenged. Both had retaliated upon Hurd, and, as Parr fancied, with success. The one, he said, had "chastised" Hurd with "wit"—the other had "baffled" him with "argument." So many cudgellings for one crime were out of all proportion. "These two excellent men," says Parr, "were not to be annoyed again and again by the poisonous arrows of slander." Neither was this excellent bishop to be "again and again" pulled up to the public bar, and annoyed for having annoyed them. "Tit for tat" all the world over; and, if a man, "being fap," as Pistol observes, and also too lively with young blood, will "try conclusions," and perhaps "assault and batter" a leash of worthy men, he must pay. But, having paid (as, suppose, five pounds), then, at Bow Street or anywhere else, he is held entitled to his five pounds' worth of battery. He has bought it, settled the bill, and got a stamped receipt. For them to claim further payment entitles him to further battery.

But one argument shall put down Dr. Parr's pretences. Were Jortin and Leland the only parties to whom Hurd or Warburton had furnished actionable matter? Not by a hundred. They had run amuck at all the men who lay in their path. To go no further than one of Parr's friends. Bishop Lowth and Hume had been assaulted with more in justice than either of those for whom Parr stood forward. Hurd had called Hume "a puny dialectician." Now, this was insolence. Hume, even as a litterator, was every way superior to the bishop; but, as a dialectician, Hume to Hurd was a Titan to a pigmy. The "Essay on Necessary Connexion," which was the seed that has since germinated into the mighty forest of German philosophy, was hardly in one sentence within Hurd's comprehension. As to Lowth, we would not quarrel with those who should fasten a quarrel upon him.

But, if that is our way of thinking, it was not Parr's. He was incensed at Hurd for his depreciation of Lowth, he was incensed with him, and justly, for his affected contempt of Hume, he was incensed with another worthy bishop for insidiously calling Lardner<sup>1</sup> "industrious," as though, in raising such a pile as the "Credibility of Gospel History" (originally counting seventeen octavo volumes), he had no other merit than that of supporting his "wife and family." Why then, my Sam, did you not visit for these offences? This question, so far as it regards Hume, Sam answers himself. "Leland and Jortin," says he, "had a right to expect from their clerical opponent a milder and more respectful treatment than that given to a sceptic who scoffed at all the principles of religion.”<sup>1</sup> By no means, doctor, I beg your pardon—Leland and Jortin had a right to fair play, and to so much every man, Tros Tyinusve, has the same right. But, once for all, let us hear an answer to this. If Leland and Jortin had a privileged case by comparison with Hume, and a claim upon Hurd’s forbearance, much more had Lowth a privileged case as regarded Parr, and a claim, if any man could have, upon his vindictive friendship, for Lowth had been Parr’s earliest patron. How comes it, then, that he left Lowth to the protection of Providence? Lowth, it will be said, redressed his own wrongs. True, he did so, but so did all of them—Hume, Jortin, Leland, &c. Supposing, therefore, Dr. Parr sought a case for his Quixotism in which he might avenge a man that was past avenging himself, why did he not “perstringe” his patron, Lowth, for taking liberties with Richard Bentley? This case was a very bad one; the “petulance” of Hurd could not be worse than the petulance of Lowth; and what a difference in the objects of their attack! Finally, let us remember this: Milner, the papist of Winchester, had the audacity publicly to denounce Porteous, Bishop of London, as a bigot and falsifier of facts; Bishop Hoadly and Bishop Shipley, as Socinians; Halifax, Bishop of Durham, as a papist (thus literally applying to Dr. Halifax the very identical aspersion which he had himself wiped off from Bishop Butler, in his edition of that prelate’s works); Dr. Rennell as a knave; and the Bishops Barrington, Watson, Benson, and Sparke, as insincere believers in the Protestant faith. This ruffian, for such he really was, Dr. Parr addressed in a long letter meant for the press. But he never printed his letter; and, now that it is printed, what do we find? An expostulation running over with courtesy, forbearance, and unreasonable concessions, no sneering, no threats. So mild was Dr. Parr in defending outraged truth—so furious in avenging his wounded self-love!<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Nathaniel Lardner, D.D., 1684-1768 —M.

Such was the famous attack on Hurd, in its moving

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey’s two Appended Notes to this page.—M.

impulse. As to its literary merit, doubtless that is considerable. Perhaps the author of the "Pursuits of Literature" went too far in styling it "astonishing and splendid." Assuredly it is in bad taste—not so much for its excess of antithesis, simply considered; that is rightly defended by Mr. Field, as a legitimate engine of rhetorical effects; but for the effort and visible straining which are often too palpably set forth in finding matter suitable for loading the opposite scales of the antithetic balance. However, it is a jeu d'esprit of great ability, and may give to an English reader some notion of the Bellenden Preface.

The other feud of this period forms a singular chapter in the secret history of books. Dr. White, the Oxford Professor of Arabic, had preached, for one year, the Bampton Lectures.<sup>1</sup> They were much admired.<sup>2</sup> But all at once a discovery was made that a part of these lectures had been written by a Mr. Badcock, a dissenting clergyman, recently dead, who latterly had ceased to be a dissenter, having conformed to the Church of England. This discovery, so painful and discreditable to the Arabic professor, was made through a bond for £500 given by Dr. White to Mr. Badcock, which B.'s sister endeavoured to recover, and which the professor was weak enough to resist. The ground which he took was plausible—that the bond had been given, not for work done, but for work to be done. At the very time when this affair broke out, Dr. Parr happened to arrive at Oxford. White was his intimate friend. But it is difficult to imagine a sort of conduct less reconcilable with the obligations of friendship than that which Parr adopted. Without delay, without consulting Professor White, he avowed his peremptory disbelief in Badcock's claim; but on what ground? On the ground that he was himself the contributor of a very considerable share of these lectures. Never did man do a more critical injury to a friend; and, were it not that the irritations of jealous vanity, with constitutional incontinency of secrets, seem to have overpowered and surprised his better resolutions, I should be compelled to pronounce it perfidy. Whatsoever help of this nature one literary man gives to another carries with it an implied obligation to secrecy; otherwise, what else results than that, under the mask of giving a partial assistance to a friend's literary fame, the writer has, in fact, been furnishing himself with the means of crushing it entirely. He has given perhaps a trifle that he might take away the whole; for, after such an exposure, the man has credit for nothing at all as certainly his own. And this injury was, as I have said, critically timed. Coming at the moment of Mr. Badcock's claim, about which much doubt prevailed, and was likely to prevail, from the death of the only person who could effectually meet the denial of White, Dr Parr's claim at one and the same time authenticated itself and Badcock's; that is, it doubly shattered White.

<sup>1</sup> Joseph White, D.D., 1746-1814. His Bampton Lectures were preached in 1784, and published that year.—M

<sup>2</sup> Gibbon, in his fifty-second chapter, had spoken of White in high terms. "He sustains," says he, "the part of a lively and eloquent advocate, and sometimes rises to the merit of an historian and philosopher."

Meantime, Parr's claim was a true one. Mr. Kett (so well known in Oxford by the name of Horse Kett, from his equine physiognomy) thus states at once the extent of Parr's contributions and their value. "Whether I consider the solidity of the argument, the comprehension of thought, or the splendour of style, I think them, upon the whole, the most able and elegant parts of the lectures. In point of quantity they are considerable, as they are more than a fifth of the whole, without reckoning the corrected passages. But their intrinsic excellence is such that any person, with such materials, might not only have obtained a great deal of present applause, but lasting fame. They are in the highest style of composition, as they are of a philosophical and refined cast, and make many of the other parts of the lecture with which they are connected appear nothing more than loose and florid declamation."

Laborious investigations, conferences, and explanations followed; in which, it appears to me, that Dr. Parr behaved with little generosity, and White with much duplicity.<sup>1</sup> One incident is remarkable: Dr. Parsons, of Baliol College, one of the arbiters or referees, at length withdrew himself from the service he had undertaken, but in so pointed and significant a manner as to satisfy myself that he also had very considerable right of property in these lectures, which his honour or his kindness had obliged him to dissemble, and that, in some one of Parr's reclamations, in making which (though perfectly sincere) he relied confessedly on a very vague recollection, or a still vaguer discrimination of styles, Parr had unintentionally been trespassing on ground which Parsons secretly knew to be his own. This is my own private opinion. To the parties interested never was any literary broil so full of vexation. Cabals were gathering at Oxford in the interest of White on the one hand, or of Dr. Gabriel of Bath on the other; the public journals took up the affair, with their usual imperfect information; private characters suffered, old friendships were dissolved for ever, and, finally, no party reaped either profit or honour from this contest for the proportions of property in a book which has long since been consigned to oblivion (however unjustly) by the whole world—whether hostile or friendly.

<sup>1</sup> See De Quincey's Appended Note to this page.—M.

But, after all, the worst scandal of this transaction settled not upon any individual so much as upon the professional body of divines in general. That part of the correspondence which got abroad admitted the public ruinously behind the curtain, and exhibited the writers concerting their parts, and arranging their passages of display, their clap-traps, and coups-de-théâtre, in a manner but little creditable to their singleness of heart, or simplicity of purpose. They had the air at one time of attorneys, scheming to obtain a verdict for Christianity; at another, of martinetts, arranging the draperies of their costume, or of figurantes, attitudinising for effect. We must be particularly brilliant, says White, in that part where we attack Gibbon. Alas! for the ancient faith—the primitive devotion—that burned in the evangelists and martyrs, in Hilariion or Paul, in Wycliffe or Luther! How little room did that allow for any thoughts about self, or calculations of literary credit! Dr. Parr, however, was no party to this huckstering traffic in devotional feeling, or this manufacture of spiritual thunder. Hypocrisy was not his failing; whatever was the value of his religious opinions, his devotional feelings were thoroughly sincere. But he suffered from the connexion in which his name appeared; and, as regarded the duties of a friend, his character has suffered in this transaction permanently, from his own indiscretions, and from the infirmity of his too ungenerous vanity.

To sum up Dr Parr's pretensions as a man of letters :—I have already sufficiently acknowledged that his talents were splendid, and fitted, under suitable guidance, to have produced a more brilliant impression on his own age than they really did, and a more lasting one on the next age than they ever will. In his lifetime, it is true that the applauses of his many pupils, and his great political friends, to a certain extent, made up for all deficiencies on his own part; but now, when these vicarious props are withdrawn, the disproportion is enormous, and hereafter will appear to be more so, between the talents that he possessed and the effects that he accomplished. This result is imputable, in part, to his own want of exertion, and the indolence with which he shrank from undertaking any labour of great compass or research, the very best of his performances being mere velitations, skirmishes, or academic exercises, and in part, also, it is imputable to a cause less open to moral reproach—namely, the comparative poverty of his philosophic understanding, between which and his talents there was no equilibrium. He gave a bright and gaudy colouring to truths which were too often trite, mean, or self-evident. And the impression was ineradicable, in a keen observer's mind, of a perpetual swell, glitter, and false inflation, beyond the occasion, and without a corresponding activity or power of thought. His architecture was barbaresque—rich in decoration at times, colossal in proportions, but unsymmetrical, and reposing on no corresponding foundations. It is very possible, and not uncommon, to have a poor understanding combined with fine talents. I do not say that Dr. Parr's understanding was a poor one; but it was in no sense emphatically a fine one, not habitually profound, not philosophically subtle. Unquestionably it was mismatched, in point of natural vigour, with his talents—that is, with his powers of giving effect to his thoughts, and realising his conceptions. The splendours of Burke, yoked, as they were, with the very finest, subtlest, and most combining intellect that ever yet has been applied to political philosophy, awoke no sense of disparity or false balance in his powers. But, in the case of Parr, we feel that, having once tasted the luxury of his periodic sentences, with their ample volume of sound and self-revolving rhythmus—having enjoyed his artful antithesis, and solemn antilibration of cadences—we have had the cream of his peculiar excellences, and may exclaim, with Romeo, that it is time to be gone, because “the sport is at the best.”

As to that other cause which co-operated to the effect I have been stating—viz. Parr’s indolence, or unpersevering industry—his excuse was the less that his stomach (where it is that most men fail) was as strong as the shield of Telamonian Ajax, and his spirits, even under attacks of illness, were indomitable, he himself styles them “lion spirits.” Heavens! what an advantage in that temperament above the general condition of literary men! Coleridge, for example, struggling with the ravages of opium through forty years, and with the res angusta domi in a degree never known to Parr, has contrived to print a score of octavo volumes. And, were all his contributions to the “Morning Post” and “Courier” collected, and his letters, many and long, together with his innumerable notes on the fly-leaves and margins of books, he would appear to have been a most voluminous author, instead of meriting the reproach (which too often I have been fated to hear) of shameful indolence and waste of stupendous powers. Of Dr. Parr’s very criminal indolence there was but one palliation—much of his life had passed in the labours of the school-room, and his leisure from those was excusably turned to purposes of relaxation. Still he had latterly a long period of immunity from toils of every kind; he had a library of above ten thousand volumes; he had increasing wealth; and, for years, he toiled not, neither did he spin. As to his execrable handwriting, that is rather an explanation than a justification of his sterility. Pretty often he had the aid of volunteer amanuenses; and was he at any time too poor to have paid a secretary? Beginning with some advantages for literary research so much beyond those of Gibbon, in his far greater familiarity with the languages of ancient books, why should Dr. Parr, the apologist of universities against Gibbon, not have left behind him a monument of learned industry as elaborate as that of his opponent? On the whole, I fear that Dr Parr, as an author, must always be classed with those who have spent their vigour upon certumina luluera, mock fights, mimic rehearsals, and shadowy combats; that his knowledge and the sweat of his brow have been laid out upon palaces of ice, incapable of surviving the immediate atmosphere under which they arose, and dissolving with the first revolution of the seasons, rather than upon the massy Roman masonry that might have sustained his influence to a distant posterity. This may seem his misfortune, but then it was a misfortune to have been foreseen. And, for the more intrinsic qualities of his works, it will be recorded in their very fate that, if their execution was sometimes such as to challenge a permanent interest, their matter was unable to support so great a distinction; and that, perhaps, of all known works, they are best fitted to illustrate the critical objection of materiam superabat opus (the workmanship transcended the material); and, finally, with regard to their author, that hardly any writer, of age so mature, of education so regular, and of pursuits so solemn and professional, had derived his subjects from occasions so ephemeral, or his excitement from motives so personal.

It remains that I should speak of Dr. Parr as a politician and as a divine: and fortunately the transcendent character of the facts will bring those inquests within the range of a short trial and a self-evident verdict.

First, as a politician. The French Revolution found Dr. Parr a Jacobin; found, I say, not made. Of this there is abundant presumption. To give his vote for Wilkes, he faced a situation of considerable risk; he was unwigged, and probably saved his life by escaping through a back window to his horse. Considering that he was then the Reverend Samuel Parr, this argued no trivial sympathy with the seditious agitator. It is true that a constitutional question was at issue in the case of Wilkes's expulsion, but it does not appear that Parr gave his countenance to Wilkes the purist of the constitution so much as Wilkes the demagogue, and loved him upon the principle laid down by Junius—viz 'so long as he was a thorn in the king's side.' Besides, right or wrong in politics, ought an impure scoffer like

Wilkes, by common repute<sup>1</sup> the author of an obscene "Essay on Woman," to have commanded the volunteer and ardent support of a clergyman? Was this decent? Such, however, were Parr's earliest attachments, and such the leonine ardour with which he displayed them. In a better cause I should have admired his courage; for he seems to have been resolved to go to Brentford,<sup>2</sup> in the spirit of Luther, though there had been "as many devils there as tiles upon the roofs of the houses"

Well, in the fulness of time came the French Revolution. The first persons to sing public pæans of congratulation in this country were the dissenters of Birmingham—moving under the domineering influence of Dr Priestley. What followed is known to all whose recollections stretch back to those tumultuous days. Dr. Priestley's house was stormed and sacked by the Birmingham mob; his philosophical apparatus (as a private one, matchless) destroyed, his papers, letters, philosophical MSS, scattered to the four winds; and the angry philosopher himself, by a fierce levanter of indignation, driven westwards to America. These scenes passed in too close neighbourhood to Dr Parr for a temper so combustible as his to escape kindling at the flame of party fury. We may be sure also that he took the side of Priestley: to the extent of pity for his misfortunes, all good men did so; but, as an approver of the conduct which provoked these misfortunes, I may almost venture to say that, amongst the fifteen thousand clergymen of the Church of England, Dr. Parr stood altogether alone. Every person of sober mind, whilst commiserating Dr Priestley as an unfortunate man, and esteeming him as a very ingenious one, could view him in no other light than as the victim of his own folly and misguided passions. Political frenzy had prompted him to acts of defiance against a mob as fanatical in one direction as himself in another; with this difference, however, that their fanaticism pointed to a very much more seasonable policy than the fanaticism of the celebrated experimentalist. The mob had retorted as an insulted and irritated mob may be expected to retort. They who play at bowls must look for rubbers. And Dr Parr, by mixing in the game, wantonly drew upon himself a participation in the danger, or at least a participation in the terror; for, after all, he seems to have been more frightened than hurt. Great was his panic, schooled by Dr. Priestley's losses, he sent off his books hastily to Oxford. They suffered from the hurried removal; and at Oxford, where they were indifferently sheltered, they suffered still more. This lesson might have done him good service, had his temper allowed him to profit by it. But neither fear nor interest was ever able to check his fanaticism. With such a temper, we may suppose that he was blinded to all sense of his own errors by the dazzling light with which his anger invested the errors of the opposite party. At an after period the Doctor's cries ascended to heaven in print against the mob and their criminal politics. Yet such is the temper of this world that, if a grave philosopher, by shaking his fist, and other acts of bravado, should happen to provoke a company of mischievous boys to reply with a shower of stones, people in general suffer their resentment to settle upon the philosopher for his wanton provocation, rather than on the boys for that lapidary style of retort in which their wrath has been trained to express itself.

<sup>1</sup> At the time of writing this I had no reason (which now, on revision, I have) for doubting Wilkes's participation in the authorship.

<sup>2</sup> "Brentford".—This gloomy place, on the left bank of the Thames, about seven miles to the west of Hyde Park Corner, is the county town of Middlesex, consequently, there it was the voting for Wilkes went on.

This affair, taken singly, being mixed up with considerations of persons and neighbourhood, might, after all, but indifferently represent the condition of Dr Parr's politics. Other ebullitions of his feelings about the same period were less equivocal. On Mr. Burke, for the crime of writing his memorable book on the French Revolution, he inflicted the whimsical punishment of inverting his portrait — that is, suspending it with the head downwards. The insolent tyranny of this act is remarkable. Mr. Burke had held up his "protesting hand" against the Revolution; and he, if ever any man upon any question, had explained the philosophic grounds of his protest. It seemed, therefore, that, with or without reasons, no dissent was tolerated from Dr Parr's views. For, as to Mr. Burke's vehemence, it was no more than the natural warmth of sincerity. Precisely the same sentence of degradation, I believe, was executed upon Mr. Windham, and for the same offence. This was intelligible, and was equity, if not justice. Equal acts merited equal treatment. But in a third case the same degradation, by greatly extending the construction of guilt, warranted much larger inferences against Dr. Parr's motives. The third criminal was Paley; on his portrait, also, sentence of inversion was passed and executed; and for years it hung at Hatton in that position. What, then, had been Paley's crime? Audi facinus majoris abollæ; he had literally been guilty of writing "Reasons for Contentment" The title explains its object. At a crisis of universal political irritation, when Paine's works and the French Revolution had combined to diffuse a spirit of change, and when the indefeasible evils of poverty were made handles of disaffection, being charged upon the institutions of the land, Dr. Paley had exerted himself to dissipate such delusions; to rouse the ignorant to a sense of the real blessings which they enjoyed under equal laws administered by a popular government; and thus to save them as well from secret discontents as from publicly lending themselves to the purposes of designing incendiaries. This was the service which he did, or attempted; and for this only, neither more nor less, he incurred the wrath of Parr. I may add that he was never forgiven. The following record of his feelings in regard to Paley he left behind him for publication:—"I never thought Paley an honest man. he had great sagacity, wit, and science, some good humour; but he was vain, inconsistent" [odd objections to come from Samuel Parr]. "he was also, it appears, . . ." [i.e. something too bad for Parr's executors to print], "and selfish."

No one fact can better illustrate the furious disaffection of Dr. Parr. Simply because a man applied his great talents to a purpose of the highest charity, which could no otherwise serve the existing ministers, even remotely and mediately, than by first of all serving<sup>1</sup> many thousands of his humble

<sup>1</sup> "Serving his countrymen"—I do not mean to assert that Paley did in any effectual sense accomplish this service; neither is the spectacle a pleasant one, of rich people, such as Paley and

countrymen directly and essentially, he became with Dr Parr a marked man. After this it will not be surprising that even the Whiggish correspondents of Parr found occasion to remind him that England was not the country in sober sadness which it suited their party tactics to represent, that he was interpreting too literally the violences of their public polemics; and that England did in fact continue to be,—what she had so long been esteemed by all the world, except her eternal enemies,—the ark to which were confided the dearest interests of man

In 1794 war had begun to rage; the revolutionary frenzy had produced its bloodiest excesses; the gloom had terrifically deepened; and the French reign of terror, by a very natural reaction on all the rest of Europe, produced a corresponding system of vigilance and coercion in all regular governments, which must now be admitted to have been too harsh and despotic, if viewed apart from the extremities of the occasion. Questions which depend for their adjudication upon the particular estimate which is taken of the impending dangers allow room for great latitude of opinion amongst honest men. From mere differences of bodily temperament, men of the sanest judgments take radically different views of the very broadest cases that can arise; and, starting as he did from Whiggish principles, Dr. Parr is entitled to a large indulgence in his construction and valuation of Mr. Pitt's policy. We ought to allow, therefore, most readily for the fervour of interest which he took, not merely as a private friend to some of the parties concerned, but also as a constitutional politician, in the state trials which occurred at that period. For poor Gerald, as a splendid pupil of his own, as an unfortunate man betrayed into calamity by generous enthusiasm, and as a martyr to most disinterested indiscretions, Parr was entitled to feel the very warmest concern. I and others, of principles very adverse to Dr. Parr's, are of opinion that Gerald was most harshly, nay, unconstitutionally, treated. He was tried (through accidental connexion with an Edinburgh club) in Scotland, and under a superannuated law of Scotland, which had arisen out of another condition of things, and was never meant for our times ; it was a mere accident that such a law should be unrepealed ; and a verdict was obtained against him that the rest of the empire could not have countenanced. This was a case beyond any other to merit a pardon, even in the opinion of those who thought Mr Gerald a turbulent democrat, since undoubtedly the verdict was in some measure obtained surreptitiously. Conduct that, on one side the Border, was then punishable with transportation, on the other was confessedly, at the very utmost, a misdemeanour. Under these circumstances, to have enforced the sentence, and to have thrown a man of genius and a scholar into the society of ruffians, and the very refuse of jails, was doubtless an unjustifiable harshness. Warmth, therefore, and earnestness might be expected from Dr Parr, in behalf of his unhappy friend. But nothing short of childish defect in self-government could have allowed Dr. Parr to insult the very person to whom he looked for a mitigation of the sentence. Yet this he did. Writing to Mr. Windham, as Home Secretary, for the exertion of his influence with Mr. Pitt, he told him with a bullying air that Mr. Gerald was as able a man as Mr. Pitt, and a great deal more learned. What followed ? Mr Windham had been acquainted with the doctor, and was the very man to have felt for the peculiar hardship of Mr Gerald's case. But of an application in this spirit he could not allow himself to take any official notice. A formal answer was returned, and Mr. Gerald's sentence was permitted to take its course. Was Windham right ? I think not. The merits of Gerald's position should not have suffered from the intemperance of his advocate. Did Windham's error tend to neutralise that of Parr ? Not at all. Parr's political enthusiasm had then risen to the height of fanaticism, which set at nought all ordinary discretion.

Hannah More, sitting in luxurious saloons, and lecturing their poor, hard-working fellow-countrymen upon the enormity of the blessings which they enjoy. But Paley's purpose was to all appearance honest and patriotic.

However, the truth must be told. the first anti-Gallican war, though supported (as I shall always maintain) by the élite of British society, by the property and education of the land, did not unite all hearts in its cause. There was still room left for honest recusants, though it is undoubtedly true that most of those who did actually stand forward conspicuously in that character were so upon any but laudable motives. Unless where they happened to be betrayed by natural defects of discretion, and original incapacity for calculating consequences—a case which I believe to be that of Dr. Parr—nearly all the sturdy recusants to Mr. Pitt's policy moved upon the very worst impulses of anti-national feeling. Pitiably blind they were in some rare instances; but in more desperately unpatriotic. Still, I repeat that room was left for honest dissent up to a certain point; and there are not a few, even now, amongst those whose patriotism was never tainted, and who gave to Mr. Pitt the fullest benefit of their accession as regarded principles, that yet question the policy of a military league against the infant republic of France—as being that which in effect, by furnishing to France the occasion for resistance, finally developed her yet unconscious strength.

But a few short years sufficed to place all this upon new foundations. If ever, in this world, a nation had one heart and one soul, it was the British nation in the spring of 1803. A poet (William Wordsworth) who had deeply protested against the first French war at this crisis exclaimed, addressing the men of Kent, who had reason to look for the first attack—

“We all are with you now from shore to shore !”

No need of sagacity at this time: blind instinct was sufficient to develop the views of the Consular government, and to appreciate the one sole policy which circumstances commanded. And here it was the Whigs (I mean the Whigs in Parliament) lost themselves, and riveted that national distrust which had first commenced with the schism in the Whig Club. They would not change their tone; they would not open their eyes to the new state of things; but continued to palliate the worst atrocities of the enemy, and to prophesy a long heritage of shame and defeat for ourselves. At that period it was many times remarked that the long habit of expressing sympathy with the national foes insensibly moulded the feelings of the Opposition to a tone of bitterness against a nation that spurned their abject counsels, and of too evident mortification at the spectacle of our military triumphs To prophesy evil for his own nation is an unwise course for any man ; it gives his vanity, and perhaps his personal enmities, an interest in the national disasters, and at all events disturbs the currents of his patriotic sympathies. Strange as it may sound, there have been Englishmen to whom it was thought necessary by their families cautiously to break the shock of the great news of Waterloo, so violent was the grief anticipated at the final prostration of their idol We could mention one man, well known in his day as a miscellaneous author, and not an unamiable man (though a coxcomb) in his character of literary patron, who, being accidentally at a dinner-party on the day when that mighty catastrophe reached Norfolk, was kept in ignorance of the news by an arrangement concerted separately with each of the guests (amongst whom was Wordsworth) as he happened to arrive . it was understood that this precaution was requisite to insure his attendance at dinner

No such case ever has occurred in France The martial successes of France in the days of Louis XIV, when the unhappy Palatinate was twice given up to desolation by French marshals, obtained the cordial sympathy of the whole people, no less than the still more atrocious acts of Napoleon. No excess of profligacy and injustice connected with martial trophies has ever damped the unity of patriotic joy amongst the French . no sanctity of defensive warfare has ever availed to insure it amongst the English And, generally, this may express no more than that freedom of thought amongst ourselves which presents all public topics under every variety of phasis But, as there are cases in morals upon which good feeling precludes all variety of judgment, so in politics there are rare crises upon which the good and evil of posterity so essentially depend that any diversity of feeling is irreconcilable with the very lowest stage of patriotism. Absolute conformity is required by simple honesty , and no toleration exists for dissenters of any class

Such a case existed from 1803 to 1815, and more eminently than ever before in the history of mankind. What was Dr Parr's behaviour ? I shall not go into it at length . to see a good man wandering so grievously from the path of his clear duty, is afflicting ; and a few instances will tell in what channel his feelings ran. In the spring of 1814, when all Christendom was exulting in the approaching destruction of the destroyer, Dr. Parr writes thus to Mr Coke —“ My indignation at the English Government, as the real and implacable disturbers of the peace of Europe, increases daily and hourly , and from that malignant spirit which began to act in 1793, and is now reinforced by the accession of such an auxiliary as the Prince Regent [ah, that sad Prince Thegent !], I forebode the most disastrous consequences. My fear is that the allies will be overruled by the earnestness, or cajoled by the bribes, of the Prince Regent and his minions.” So, then, upon this view of things, Jena, Austerlitz, Borodino, the outrages upon Spain, Portugal, Germany, Russia, were not French — they were British acts. But patience !

In what way it was that Dr. Parr received the Waterloo news we learn from no express record ; but, indirectly, we can easily collect it. About two months before that battle, he anticipated such an event as what was most to be abominated. The horizon already reddened with the dawn of that coming retribution , already it was believed that to England, in reward of her matchless perseverance, would be assigned the exterminating sword<sup>1</sup> ; and Dr. Parr—sharing that belief, but abjuring the moral hopes of that belief—sickens at the prospect Worse than this we cannot say of any man. I may add, however, that his condition of feeling on these subjects continued pretty uniform. He wrote violently against assassination, and the exception often urged in favour of tyrannicide. But how exclusively the benefit of even this doctrine was applied to our enemy may be judged by this:—Mr. Percival was murdered in the summer of 1812 by a stranger (Bellingham), not known to him even by sight ; Dr. Parr’s attention is attracted by no one consideration but the excuses which might be offered for the assassin. The Duc de Berri is murdered, without even the shadow of a provocation, by one whom he also did not know ; Dr. Parr assures his correspondent that he (not the murderer, as one would naturally wish to understand the passage, but the murdered prince) was a "vulgar ruffian." Again, as another illustration of his fanatic violence, Mr Hone publishes parodies on the Scriptures<sup>1</sup>: as a politician after his own heart, though in a conscious opposition to the decorums of his sacred profession, and to his own sincere reverence for religion, Dr Parr encourages and sanctions him by a money subscription. And we find the Duke of Bedford, who forfeited the distinction of representing his sovereign in his own county solely by a participation in the same expression of approbation, directly justifying his conduct (upon which, in some views, he felt a doubt) by Dr. Parr's example. Not, certainly, that the duke would have laid any stress upon Dr. Parr's authority in a question merely political; but, where the politics of the case had been complicated with a point of religious casuistry,—viz how far it was right to take a judicial notice of scoffs pointed at the religious creed of the land,—his grace had naturally supposed that path to be safe which had been trodden by a professional divine. I might accumulate many more cases; but enough is here cited to show that, as a politician, Dr Parr stood aloof from his country in the hour of her most memorable trials, and dishonoured his grey hairs by absolute fanaticism that lost sight finally even of his religious principles.

<sup>1</sup> “ The exterminating sword ” :—See Wordsworth’s “Sonnet on Waterloo”

This leads me to the view of Dr. Parr as a divine, in which it had been my intention to show that in every part of his life he allowed the principles of his theology to be biassed by his political prejudices. Dissenters of all classes were welcome to him, whether their dissent began originally upon religious or political views, because in any case it terminated in hostility to the state. Upon examining Dr. Parr's sermons, I find too little of a regular chain or system of religious principles to sustain the review which I meditated: and of the correspondence yet published too small a part turns upon theological questions to do much in supplying this defect. I shall content myself for the present, therefore, with observing that, whilst he dwelt with ludicrous self-congratulation upon the support he gave to orthodoxy in the purest trifles, he really betrayed the interests of his Church in its two capital interests,—as against the Roman Catholics on the one hand, and the Socinians on the other. Long and laboured were his pleadings for the Roman Catholics, and for the relaxation of the penal laws against them, in his notes upon Mr Fox's "History"; and on the other hand he attacked the Archbishop of Dublin, otherwise a friend and admirer, in a rancorous tone, for denying the title of Christianity (in which denial he is countenanced by many a score of learned and pious men) to Socinianism. Finally, he left for posthumous publication a printed record of his dissatisfaction with Anti-Socinian and Anti-Arian arguments, and he has left repeated evidence, apart from his known leaning to Socinian views, that he had not in any stage of his life adopted any system at all which could properly class him with the believers in the Trinity.

<sup>1</sup> William Hone, 1779-1842. For the "Parodies" here mentioned he was tried in December 1817, but acquitted.—M.

Dr. Parr in one point showed himself superior to a popular error. Even Archbishop Land, but more memorably another Primate (Wake) of the following century, had fallen into the weakness of supposing that the English Church and the Gallican could terminate their differences as if by a compact of mutual concession. But no treaty of compromise could restore the real "Catholic unity"; no remedy could in that way be applied to the evils of schism in the Christian Church. Towns and territory may be the subject of cession, but not truth. And of this Dr Parr was fully sensible. Yet in other aspects of the same weak passion for a hollow name of peace Dr. Parr was often as blind as others. Pity that he had not more uniformly remembered the spirit of a maxim which he sometimes quoted from Grotius—that he so loved Peace as not to sacrifice Truth. He persuaded himself often that the differences of men in religious matters were in a large proportion verbal: a common, a very common, but a very shallow maxim. On the contrary, from my earliest days I have remarked that, for one verbal dispute which passes for a real one, there are ten disputes undoubtedly real which are popularly dismissed as verbal. "Tu fis," says Boileau,

"Tu fis dans une guerre si triste et si longue Périr tant de Chrétiens—martyrs d'une diphthongue."

Martyrs of a diphthong? Yes. But Boileau, as much as anybody, maintained that this single diphthong was the occasion that the Church “sentit trembler la vérité Chrétienne”: the whole peculiar truth of Christianity reposed upon that one diphthong—for it made the whole difference between the Catholic ὁμοούσιος and the Arian ὁμοίουσιος: so mighty are the differences which may be involved, not in a word only, but even in a syllable, and so truly did Boileau, therefore, but destructively to his own argument, characterise even that as “une syllabe impie.” (Sat. xii.)

I have questioned the systematic perfection, the orbicularity (so to speak), of Dr. Parr’s classical knowledge. Much more certainly might I question the coherency, as a whole, of his divinity. What he adopted in this department was taken up casually and independently: his theology was not the fruit of laborious investigation at the fountain-heads. It was gleaned here and there, separately, by fragments, from chance authors, and not finally fused or harmonised.

Finally, and as the sum of my appreciation, I should say that, speaking of him as a moral being, Dr. Parr was naturally good and conscientious, but (in a degree which sometimes made him not conscientious) the mere football of passion. As an amiable man, I must add that, by the testimony of his best friend, he was a domestic nuisance; he also, as well as his father, says Dr. Johnstone, was “the tyrant of the fireside.” As a scholar, he was brilliant; but he consumed his power in gladiatorial displays, and has left no adequate monument of his powers. As a politician, he sank his patriotism in the spirit of a partisan, and forgot to be an Englishman in his fanaticism for the ultra Whigs. And, last of all, as a divine, for the sake of those sectaries whom charity enjoined him to tolerate, he betrayed that Church which it was his holiest duty to defend.

POSTSCRIPT IN 1857 <sup>1</sup>

IN the paper on Dr. Parr a careless reader may fancy that I, being a Tory, am illiberal enough to assume that Whiggism is in itself a matter of reproach. But in this he would be doing me great injustice ; for it happens that I have placed on record my own peculiar views of the relation subsisting between the doctrine of the Tories and that of the Whigs,<sup>2</sup>—which views represent them as separately forming the two hemispheres which jointly compose the total truth. In a paper on that subject I contend that, when Charles Fox undertook a History of our English Revolution with the purpose of glorifying the Whigs in contradistinction to the Tories as the heroes of that great event, he made shipwreck of all political philosophy. The misconception was total. A Trinitarian, I there said by way of illustration, and an anti-Trinitarian cannot both be right : in such a case the affirmation of either is the negation of the other. But in very many cases this is far otherwise. The Whig and the Tory, for instance, are both right, and both equally right. Not only so, but the one is right only because (and so long as) the other is right. Singly, the Tory would be wrong. Singly, the Whig would be wrong. But, taken jointly, they compose that synthesis which realises and embodies the total constitutional truth. The Whig takes charge of the constitutional forces in one direction; the Tory in another. And it would be as absurd to invest either party with a superior function as to imagine the centripetal force more important than the centrifugal in the planetary system of motions. Were the Whig withdrawn, instantly the Tory would become a redundant and destructive power; and vice versa. Both Whig and Tory shared equally in our Revolution. Meantime, not one act in a thousand done or proposed by the Whig or Tory party concerns them as Whigs or as Tories. For instance, to each of these parties at different periods foreign politics have presented a ruinous snare. During the four last years of Queen Anne the Tories played the most treasonable part. That was early in the eighteenth century. Almost in the corresponding years of the nineteenth century the very same false and treacherous part was played by the Whigs; but in this respect more criminally by far, inasmuch as the danger was incomparably greater from 1803 to 1812 than from 1703 to 1712. The enemy at whose feet the Whigs would have laid us prostrate from 1807 to 1815 was Napoleon, with a servile Europe at his back. whereas, in the corresponding case of the preceding century, the enemy was Louis XIV, menaced by a growing confederacy of our allies.

<sup>1</sup> What is here necessarily given as a postscript to the paper on Dr. Parr formed a portion of the preface prefixed by De Quincey in 1857 to the volume of his collected writings containing that paper.—M.

<sup>2</sup> De Quincey here refers to a paper of his which appeared in Tait's Edinburgh Magazine for December 1835 and January 1836, under the title "A Tory's Account of Toryism, Whiggism, and Radicalism." He did not live to republish that paper, but it will be given in a future volume of this edition.—M.

The reader understands, therefore, that I do not (and could not consistently) disparage or anywhere condemn Dr. Parr as a Whig. Those acts which reflect shame and reproach upon his character and the claims of his clerical profession had no connexion with Whig principles: very often they were acts discountenanced, or at the least not countenanced, by his own political party. But, in those rarer cases where the acts really had such a partisan countenance, the party concerned in the first place was not the Whigs as opposed to the Tories, but the Outs as opposed to the Ins. It was with no reference to their party creed that Messrs. Fox, Grey, Tierney, Sheridan, &c., oftentimes lent their support to Dr. Parr: not at all; it was simply as the party in opposition (whether Whigs or Tories), pulling an oar against the party in office. pledging, therefore, no principles whatever in Dr. Parr's behalf, but simply weight of influence. Finally, in those very rare cases where the Whig party as Whigs avowed their patronage to an act or to a book of Dr. Parr's, there was still room left for this objection: that it was the act of a schismatical Whig party,—of one section dividing against the other, and leaving it doubtful which was the true depository of Whiggism, which the spurious.

APPENDED NOTES

GENERAL NOTE.

THE errors of the press, and the errors of the redacteur himself, are very serious in Dr. Johnstone's large and costly work. Let me take the liberty of counselling him, if from a Tory he will accept counsel, to change the whole form of his labours—in German phrase to reproduce them in an umbearbeitung, or thorough recast on the following plan, as soon as ever the sale of the present arrangement shall have been sufficient to warrant him in doing so. Complying with this or some similar proposal, he will at once consult Dr. Parr's interests as a man of letters, and will do that service to scholars which they have almost a right to demand of him. First of all, let the sermons be dismissed, they load the edition, and hang heavily upon its circulation, with no apparent benefit of any kind, none of them have ever been popular, or in the eye of the public, except the Spital Sermons, and those, being miscellaneous philosophic essays, have a special privilege of reprieve. The sermons are liable to the continual suspicion of being in part only of Dr. Parr's composition, from his known practice (which he even avowed) of interweaving auxiliary passages from divines who happened to meet his own views, or, in some instances, of deriving his whole groundwork from others, and simply running variations of his own, many or few, upon his adopted theme. It is possible (but the public are not aware in what degree) that the sermons selected for publication may be free from this particular objection, but, at all events, as a body, the readers of sermons are too devout a class to find their own peculiar taste gratified in a collection breathing the Parrian spirit of religion. For instance, one sermon undertakes the defence of hunting, and might very properly have come from one of the brilliant brothers of the Melton Mowbray establishment. This having been preached in the morning, I see no reason why the evening service should not have brought us an apology for steeplechases, which seem even to have the advantage in this point—that such matches never lose sight of the church. At least, in their origin, steeplechases obeyed that law—

Ride at the steeple, no matter what obstacles interpose. Certain it is that the sermons, whether otherwise of merit or not, are in this respect faulty, that they do not contemplate any determinate audience professedly, indeed, they are parish discourses, and yet they deal with topics foreign to the needs and sympathies of a plain rural congregation, sometimes even inaccessible to their understandings. Doubtless all farmers would understand the hunting sermon, but how many would enter in any sense into the question of Christ's descent into Hades? However, I need not discuss the value of the sermons—good or bad, here they are, printed for the benefit of all readers, if any such there are, who happen to want them, and they are certainly not wanted by the vast majority of scholars—of whom, on the other hand, few but would put some value on the philological speculations of Dr. Parr—and, according to their feeling and taste, all connoisseurs in Latin composition would be glad to possess so brilliant an ἀγώνισμα in rhetoric as the “Bellenden Preface.” Thus, therefore, let the new edition stand.—Reprint all Dr. Parr's critical tracts, essays, or fragments,—of course, not omitting (as Dr. Johnstone has done, with no intelligible explanation, vol. i p. 543) the long investigation of the word sublime (already much abridged by Dugald Stewart), nor the various reviews of classical works contributed to literary journals by Dr. P., wheresoever these reviews happen to be of any value<sup>1</sup>. Even the letters, when they discuss critical questions, should be detached from the main body of miscellaneous correspondence, and united by way of appendix to the rest of the critical matter. Points of criticism, it is true, in the letters, are rarely insulated from occasional and personal matter, which would become irrelevant in its new situation, but this objection might be met by confining the extracts strictly to those passages which are critical, and printing them as so many separate notices or memoranda, under the title of Adversaria. These might be accumulated in one volume, which, by means of a separate title-page, could be sold as a distinct work, and, by means of a half-title, could also take its place as one section of Dr. Parr's general works. These would perhaps compose two more volumes, each offering the same recommendation, and, by means of special half-titles, the same opportunities to separate purchasers—one being made up of the very élite of his essays on political or moral subjects, the other of his rhetorical bravuras.

Page 20.

Lord Wellesley<sup>2</sup> has been charged with a foible of the same kind—how truly, I know not. More than one person of credit assumed me, some fifty and odd years ago, that, at his levees, when Governor-General of India, he was gratified, as by a delicate stroke of homage, upon occasionally seeing people throw their eyes to the ground—dazzled, as it were, by the effulgent lustre of his own. This is possible; at the same time I cannot but acknowledge that my faith in the story was in some slight degree shaken by finding the same toppery attributed to Augustus Cæsar in the Memoirs of Suetonius. Meantime it is a singular coincidence that Lord Wellesley resembled Augustus Cæsar in stature, in eyes, and in delicacy of features.

<sup>1</sup> I say this because the review of Combe's “Horace,” which Dr. Johnstone has re-published, is chiefly occupied with trifling typographical minutæ. The obscura diligentia of such corrections will be unprofitable to any class of readers (I should imagine), unless it were the class of publishers or editors meditating new and more elaborate editions of “Horace.”

<sup>2</sup> At the time of writing this, Lord Wellesley meant the Marquis Wellesley, second Earl of Mornington, and elder brother to the Duke of Wellington.

Page 21.

Those who carry a spirit of distinguishing refinement into their subdivisions and classifications of colloquial talent, according to its powers and qualities, may remark one peculiar feature in Edmund Burke's style of talking, which contradistinguished it from Dr Johnson's. It grew, one sentence was the rebound of another, one thought rose upon the suggestion, or more properly upon the impulse, of something which went before. Burke's motion, therefore, was all a going forward. Johnson's, on the other hand, was purely regressive and analytic. That thought which he began with contained, by involution, the whole of what he afterwards put forth. The two styles of conversation corresponded to the two theories of generation: one (Johnson's) to the theory of Preformation (or Evolution), where all the future products, down to the very last, lie secretly wrapped up in the original germ,—consequently nothing is positively added, everything is simply unveiled, the other (Burke's) to the theory of Epigenesis, where each stage of the growth becomes a causative impulse to a new stage,—every separate element in the mysterious process of generation being, on this hypothesis, an absolute supervention of new matter, and not a mere uncovering of old, already involved at starting in the primary germ. A great gain would be obtained for intellectual philosophy, if a sufficient body of themes, Burkian and Johnsonian, were assembled, and illustrated by an ample commentary, under the distinction here indicated.

Page 29.

Dr Parr's casuistry for regulating his practice in the case of his being called upon to read occasional forms of prayer, proclamations, &c, which he might not approve as a politician (and, observe, he never did approve them), was this: read he must; that was the text of his apology; thus far he was bound to blind submission. Passive obedience was an unconditional duty, but not active. Now it would be an active obedience to read with proper emphasis and decorum. Therefore everybody sees the logical necessity of reading it into a farce, making grimaces, "inflicting one's eye," and in all ways keeping up the jest with the congregation. Was not this the boy for Ignatius Loyola?

Page 31

Had Mr Fox lived a little longer, the current belief is that he would have raised Dr Parr to the mitre, and, had the Doctor himself survived a little longer, Lord Grey would perhaps have tried his earliest functions in that line upon him.

Page 33

I may have an opportunity further on of showing what was Parr's conduct to the Church of which he professed himself a member, and in what sense he could be said to have betrayed it. At present I shall protect myself from misconstruction by saying that his want of fidelity to the rights and interests of the Church was not deliberate or systematic; in this as in other things, he acted from passion—sometimes from caprice. He would allow only this or that doctrine of the Church to be defended; he would ruinously limit the grounds of defence; and on these great questions he gave way to the same rank personal partialities which, in the management of a school, had attracted the notice, and challenged the disrespect, of boys.

Page 39.

Even that was possibly barbed, in some of its consequences to Parr, by his own imprudence. The widow (his stepmother) is said to have injured Parr by her rapacity. But, if so, Parr had certainly himself laid the foundation of an early hatred between them, by refusing to lay aside his mourning for his own mother on the marriage-day of this second Mrs Parr with his father. I do not much quarrel with his conduct on that occasion, considering his age (sixteen) and the relation of her for whom he mourned. But still the act was characteristic of the man, and led to its natural results.

Page 41.

Laying together all the incidents of that time, it is scarcely possible to doubt that Parr conducted himself with great impropriety. Benjamin Heath neither answered the letter in which Parr attempted to clear himself from the charge of exciting the boys of Harrow to insurrection against Heath's authority, nor did he so much as leave his card at Stanmore in acknowledgment of Parr's call upon himself. As to Mr Smith, the rector, celebrated for his wit and ability, the early associate of Johnson and Garrick, he, from being "the warmest of Parr's friends" (such is Mr. Roderick's language), soon became cool, and finally ceased to speak. Mr Roderick does not acquit his friend of the chief blame in this rupture.

Page 42.

Dr. Johnstone, however, speaking of the pamphlet as a composition, discovers in it "all the peculiarities of Parr's style—its vigour, its vehemence, its clearness," its et cætera, et cætera, and, lastly, its "splendid imagery", and, obviously by way of a specimen of this last quality, he quotes the following most puerile rhetoric "I had arrayed myself in a panoply of the trustiest armour—in the breast-plate of innocence, the shield of the law, the sword of indignation, and the helmet of intrepidity. When I first entered the lists against these hardy combatants, I determined to throw away the scabbard": and so forth. The sword of indignation! Birch-rod he surely means. Most people will think that the bombs of contempt, and the mortars of derision, ought to open upon any person, not having the privilege of childhood, who could write such stilted fustian.

Page 45.

Parr's extreme and well-merited unpopularity with an order whom he had, through life, sneered at and misrepresented, is a little disguised to common readers by the fact that he corresponds with more than one bishop on terms of friendship and confidence. But this arose, generally speaking, in later life, when time sufficient had been allowed for early school-fellows and pupils of his own being raised to the mitre. The logic of the case is, therefore, naturally misinterpreted. His episcopal correspondents were such, not as bishops, but as old acquaintances.

Page 54.

As disputing with a Prince of Wales is something rarer even than waltzing with a Lord Chancellor, or smoking a cigar with the Pope—things which have been done, however—I suppose it may entertain my readers to see the rest of the discussion; especially as it concerns two persons eminent in their day, and one of them still interesting to our literature.—

"As I knew them both so intimately" (replied the Prince), "you will not deny that I had the power of more accurately appreciating their respective merits than you can have had. In their manner of teaching, you may judge of my estimation of Markham's superiority—his natural dignity and authority, compared with the Bishop of Worcester's smoothness and softness, and I now add (with proper submission to your authority on such a subject), his experience as a schoolmaster, and his better scholarship"—"Sir" (said Parr), "your Royal Highness began this conversation, and, if you permit it to go on, must tolerate a very different inference."—"Go on" (said the Prince); I declare that Markham understood Greek better than Hurd; for, when I read Homer, and hesitated about a word, Markham immediately explained it, and then we went on; but, when I hesitated with Hurd, he always referred me to the dictionary ; I therefore concluded he wanted to be informed himself"—“Sir” (replied Parr), “I venture to differ from your Royal Highness’s conclusion. I am myself a schoolmaster ; and I think that Dr. Hurd pursued the right method, and that Dr. Markham failed in his duty.<sup>1</sup> Hurd desired your Royal Highness to find the word in the lexicon, not because he did not know it, but because he wished you to find by search, and learn it thoroughly. Dr. Hurd was not eminent as a scholar, but it is not likely that he would have presumed to teach your Royal Highness without knowing the lesson himself”—“Have you not changed your opinion of Dr. Hurd ?” exclaimed the Prince ; “I have read a work in which you attack him fiercely.”—“Yes, sir, I attacked him on one point which I thought important to letters, and I summoned the whole force of my mind, and took every possible pains to do it well, for I consider Hurd to be a great man. He is celebrated as such by foreign critics, who appreciate justly his wonderful acuteness, sagacity, and dexterity in doing what he has done with his small stock of learning. There is no comparison, in my opinion, between Markham and Hurd as men of talents. Markham was a pompous schoolmaster—Hurd was a stiff and cold, but a correct gentleman. Markham was at the head of a great school, then of a great college, and finally became an archbishop. In all these stations he had trumpeters of his fame, who called him great, though he published one concio only, which has already sunk into oblivion. From a farm-house and village school, Hurd emerged, the friend of Gray and a circle of distinguished men. While fellow of a small college, he sent out works praised by foreign critics, and not despised by our own scholars. He enriched his understanding by study, and sent from the obscurity of a country village a book, sir, which your royal father is said to have declared made him a bishop. He made himself unpopular in his own profession by the defence of a fantastical system. He had decriers ; he had no trumpeters ; he was great in and by himself ; and perhaps, sir, a portion of that power and adroitness you have manifested in this debate might have been owing to him.” Fox, when the Prince was gone, exclaimed in his high tone of voice, “He thought he had caught you, but he caught a Tartar !”

In the last words only Parr seems to have remembered that he was addressing a prince. In what he said of Hurd’s Greek scholarship, and motive for referring the Prince to the lexicon, though probably wrong as to the matter of fact (for Hurd’s impulse was laziness), he might be right as to the principle ; and at least he was there talking on a point of his own profession, which he might be presumed to understand better than the rest of the company, or at any rate the courtesies of social life obliged the company to suppose that he did

---

1 “Duty” :—I interrupt the passage for a moment to direct the reader’s attention to the preposterous word “duty.” The Archbishop might be wrong, as in a matter open to large varieties of method, but assuredly neither he, nor the Bishop of Worcester, is to be burdened for a moment with obligations of conscience in the exercise of an art liable to an infinite range of variations in practice.

But who can forbear smiling, and thinking of the professor who lectured Hannibal on the art of war, at that passage where Parr, addressing the Prince of Wales, undertakes to characterise Hurd's pretensions as a gentleman?

Page 56.

Johnson had many of the elements which go to the composition of a gentleman in a very high degree, though it is true that these were neutralised, at times, by some one overmastering prejudice or caprice. His silent acquiescence in the royal praise, and the reason on which he justified this acquiescence—that it did not become him to bandy compliments with his sovereign,—is in the finest spirit of high breeding, and reminds me of a similar test for trying gentlemanly feeling, applied to the English ambassador (Lord Stair) by the Regent Duke of Orleans. The reader probably recollects the case. The Regent had signified, by a motion of his hand, that the Ambassador should enter the coach first, upon which Lord Stair immediately did so, justly feeling that the slightest hesitation on his part would have raised a false punctilio, as though the ranks of the two men were so nearly on a level that the Regent might be forgetting himself, and might need to be set right by the Ambassador. The act of Lord Stair dissipated in a moment this false construction. By his instantaneous obedience to the pleasure of the Regent, he recognised at once his own precedence as a creation of the moment, and in that light as a silent proclamation of the supremacy as to rank and power residing in his Royal Highness.

Page 63.

“The Doctor begged me one morning to take him into S P’s belfry. Secure from interruption, he proceeded with his intended object, which was to raise and pull (pull?) scientifically the tenth or largest bell. He set to work in silent, solemn formality. It took some time,—I suppose, a full quarter of an hour, for there was the raising, the full funereal toll, and the regular toll. When it was over, he stalked about the belfry in much pomposity. On recomposing himself, he looked at me with a smile, and said, ‘There; what think you of that?’ He was evidently very proud of the effort.” In a Greek character of Dr Parr by Sir William Jones, among the repositories of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, neither the bell-ringing nor the ox-massaging is overlooked. “καὶ τὸ ὄλον κωδωνίζειν, δυνατὸς καὶ παρονομάζειν, καὶ δικεύειν, καὶ ταυροκοπεῖν.”—[And, to sum up the Doctor’s accomplishments, he was a smart hand at bell-ringing, and as a punster, and at quoit-playing, and at slaughtering bulls.] As to bell-ringing, none but natives of England proper are judges on this art, for elsewhere it has no existence. On the Continent, where-soever art is applied to bell-ringing, I believe that generally it takes the shape of pure clock-work, as in the Carillons of Ostend, &c., which admit of no aid from human hands any more than our own chimes. In Scotland, again, there can be no bell-ringing, as there are no bells. A peal of bells is a thing unknown. But in England, where countless parish churches have peals of eight and ten bells, the art of bell-ringing is very elaborate, and trying in more ways than one. It requires long-disciplined skill, and great muscular power. Dr Parr's arms had been kept in training by half-a-century of successful flagellation. I may add that the music from a finely-toned set of bells, when heard upon a winding river, in summer, under the farewell lights of setting suns, is the most pathetic in the world.

Page 69.

I am the last person to apologise for that most profligate woman. That men of sense and honour could be found who seriously doubted of her guilt is the strongest exemplification, to my mind, of the all-levelling strength in party rage that history records. As little am I likely to join the rare and weak assailants of Sir Walter Scott, whose conduct politically was as upright and as generous as his conduct in private life. Yet, in one single instance, Sir Walter departed from his usual chivalry of feeling, and most unseasonably joined in insulting a woman—dissolute, it is true, beyond example, but at that time fallen, and on that very morning reaping the bitter first fruits of her enormous guilt. Describing the morning of the Coronation, and the memorable repulse of the poor misguided Queen, Sir Walter allowed himself to speak of her as the great Lady, with her body-guard of black-guards. These words I doubt not that Sir Walter soon, and often, and earnestly deplored; for the anguish of her mortification, by the testimony of all who witnessed the tumultuous succession of passions that shook her, and convulsed her features, as she argued the point with the officer at the entrance of Westminster Hall, was intense; and those pitied her then who never pitied her before. There were also other reasons that must have drawn a generous regret from Sir Walter, upon remembering these words afterwards. But we all know that it was not in his nature to insult over the fallen, or to sympathise with triumphant power. In fact, he could not foresee her near-approaching death; and he was reasonably disgusted with her violence at the moment, and, finally, the words escaped him under circumstances of hurry, which allowed no time for revision. Few indeed are the writers who have so little to blot as this distinguished man.

Page 78.

And perhaps, in candour it should be added, under happier fortunes and more prudence in his liaisons with the other sex. He was in some degree a dissolute man; but perhaps he might have been otherwise under more noble treatment from the woman of his heart. His unhappiness on this point lately was great; and there is reason to think that he secretly wished to lay down his life, and resorted to politics as the best means of doing so with reputation. He had a passionate love for an unworthy woman, whom he had strong reasons for thinking unfaithful to him. And, at all events, she had the baseness to trifle with his apparent misery.

Page 81.

It is remarkable, however, that Sir William's Greek is far better than Parr's. Jones's has all the air of the genuine antique. Parr's is villainous.

Page 82

I say Latin secretary, as indicating an office, so far as regards its duties, which really does exist, though the emoluments do not. There is a great deal of public work to be executed in Latin, and it is done gratis, and by various hands. But, were this an age for increasing the public burdens, I should suggest the propriety of creating anew the formal appointment of Latin Secretary, which ought for many reasons never to have been abolished. The Fox Ministry would have done rightly to have restored the office, and to have rewarded Dr Parr by the first appointment.

Page 83.

But surely the brother of Sir Henry Halford (as the warden of Merton, Dr Peter Vaughan, I believe was) needed not to have gone out of his own family connexions for such an assistance, since Sir Henry himself writes Latin with ease and effect.

Page 85.

I cannot fancy Heyne as a Latin evagates. The last time I opened a book of his (perhaps it was his Vuigi), some sixteen years ago, he was labouring at this well-known phrase—“regione viarum” As usual, a rhapsody of resemblances, more or less remote, was accumulated, but, if I may be believed, that sole meaning of the word regio which throws light upon the expression, that meaning which connects it with the word rego in the mathematical sense (i. e. to drive a straight line), was unnoticed. All the rest meant nothing. I closed the book in disgust.

Page 88.

William Bellenden, a Scotch writer, flourished at the beginning of the seventeenth century, and is said to have been a professor in the University of Paris. At Paris he published, in 1608, his “Cicero Princeps,” a singular work, in which he extracted from Cicero's writings detached remarks, and compressed them into one regular body, containing the rules of monarchical government, with the line of conduct to be adopted, and the virtues proper to be encouraged by the prince himself, and this treatise, when finished, he dedicated, from a principle of patriotism and gratitude, to the son of his master,—Henry, then Prince of Wales. Four years afterwards (namely, in 1612), he proceeded to publish another work of a similar nature, which he called "Cicero Consul, Senator, Senatusque Romanus," in which he treated the nature of the consular office, and the constitution of the Roman Senate. Finding the works received, as they deserved, with the unanimous approbation of the learned, he conceived the plan of a third work, "De Statu Prisci Orbis," which was to contain a history of the progress of government and philosophy, from the times before the Flood to their various degrees of improvement under the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans. He had proceeded so far as to print a few copies of this work in 1615, when it seems to have been suggested that, his three treatises, "De Statu Principis," "De Statu Republicæ," "De Statu Orbis," being on subjects so nearly resembling each other, there might be a propriety in uniting them into one work, by re-publishing the two former, and entitling the whole "Bellendenus de Statu Orbis." With this view, he recalled the few copies of his last work that were abroad, and, after a delay of some months, he published the three treatises together, under their new title, in the year 1615.

In the British Museum one copy of the book "De Statu Prisci Orbis," dated in 1615, still exists, which the author had probably sent into England as a present, and could not recall, and in all the others the date appears, on a nice inspection, to have been originally MDCXV, and to have had an I afterwards added, on the alteration of the author's plan. The editor has shown great ingenuity in clearing up this typographical difficulty. The great work being now completed, Bellenden looked forward with a pretty well-grounded expectation for that applause which his labour and his ingenuity deserved, but his views were disappointed by one of those events that no art of man can foresee or remedy. The vessel in which the whole impression had been embarked was overtaken by a storm before she could reach the English coasts, and foundered with all her cargo.

A very few copies only, which the learned author either kept for his own use, or had sent as presents by private hands, seem to have been preserved from the destruction which awaited the others, and this work of Bellendenus has, therefore, from its scarcity, often escaped the notice of the most diligent collectors. It is not to be found in the library of the Duke of Aigyle [Roxburgh?], nor in that of the late Dr. Hunter, neither Morhoffius nor Fabricius had ever seen it, the "Observationes Literariæ" at Frankfort in 1728, which treat learnedly and copiously on scarce books, makes no mention of it. In a word, the single treatises are so rare that not above ten of them are to be found in all the libraries of England. And of the larger work it does not appear that more than six copies are known to exist: one in the public library at Cambridge, a second in that of Emanuel College, in the same University, long admired as a well-chosen collection of excellent books; a third in All-Souls' Library at Oxford; and two in the possession of the editors.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> There is another in the library of Shrewsbury School, left by Dr Taylor, editor of Demosthenes, to that foundation.

Page 88.

Colman had said that the veise in the "Pursuits of Literature" was only "a peg to hang the notes upon": a jest too obvious, perhaps, but also too true for the irritable author; who had the meanness, amongst some impotent attempts at affecting a grin of nonchalance, to tell his readers that the jest was stolen, and stolen from Pindar! Great was my curiosity on hearing this. A Pindaric jest! What could it be, and where? Was it an Olympic or a Pythian jest? Why, Pindar, it seems, "said long before Mr. Colman, ἀπὸ πασσάλου φόρμιγγα λάβε." And what then? He took down his harp from a peg; that is to say, a literal metallic harp from a literal wooden peg. What earthly connexion could that have with Mr Colman's jest? Now, this, though in re levissima, I regard as a downright villainy. Mathias tells a clamorous falsehood in order to convict his antagonist of a theft. The long and the short of the case is that, being stung by a sarcasm, and not having the magnanimity to bear it, he tries vainly to retaliate by a consciously mendacious charge upon his assailant of having stolen the sarcasm, well knowing, at the time of making this insinuation, that there was not, nor could be, in the author alleged, any shadow of a sarcasm to steal.

For the "absolute silliness," amongst many hundred passages of pure trifling or exquisite nonsense, let the reader look to Mathias's long note upon Godwin, and his "gun of generation", where, under an impression that he was lashing some peculiar conceit or caprice of that gentleman, the satirist has unconsciously engaged himself with Hume and his Doctrine of Causation.

I say so much upon this author because (though almost forgotten at present) in my younger days he had a splendour of success not much surpassed even by the most popular writers of this present more literary generation, and because, spite of his bad taste, his pedantry, and his cloudy affectations, he had a demon of originality about him, which makes him, after all, worthy of preservation, and even of study. A strange fact it is in Dr Parr's literary history that this same malicious satirist, from whom he received insults so flagrant and so public, at an after period became his all but idolised friend. In saying this, I assume it as a thing admitted universally that Mr. Mathias and the satirist in question were one and the same person. Letters from this Mr. Mathias are spoken of by Dr Parr in another period of his life with a fervour of devotion such as a Roman Catholic limits to the very holiest class of relics.

Page 90.

Dr Parr (but on what particular sense of necessity I pretend not to conjecture) has used the words textus for text, and margo for margin; and he apologises for them in the following words —

"Quod textum et marginem, et alia istiusmodi verba sine ulla

præfatione, et quasi παραμυθία usurpavi, id ne bilem moveat inter eos qui limatulum præ cæteris et politulum habere iudicium sibi videantur.”—i.e. “Whereas I have used the Latin word textus for expressing the English word text, and margo for the margin of a page, and have used other words of the same kind, without præfatory explanation, or any semblance of a conciliatory excuse, let not this be any cause of offence amongst those who presume themselves to have a special refinement and delicacy of judgment in comparison with others.” And he goes on to say that spiteful critics of shallow discernment make these cavils, which possibly they would not make if aware of the answer made to them by Henry Stephens. That learned and able man has brought the question to this point: “Not so properly refined as effeminately fastidious would those ears be which could refuse to tolerate such words, at any rate in a case where all other equivalent expressions are wanting.” Well, let the question then be rested on that footing, and so decided. Nobody in the world, as the reader will collect from another part of this paper, has less sympathy than myself with idle cavillers, or less indulgence towards the scruples which grow out of excessive Puritanism in style. Yet in these instances I do not perceive that the scruples are of that character. For I cannot perceive that the questionable words are protected by the reservation of Stephens—quum alia desint. Surely oia libri expresses margin, and orationis perpetuitas, or continuuitas sermonis, might serve to express the idea of text (for the body of the composition, as contradistinguished from its notes).

Page 92.

Upon this subject, in its relation, not to Latin, but to classical English, we have an essay in our own times from a writer of great talent, Mr. Foster, the Baptist clergyman. It is strange to say that the tendency of that essay is in direct hostility to his own peculiar views. Doctrinally, he contends earnestly for the peculiar tenets and mysteries of the Christian economy, and yet, on the other hand, as a man of taste, he would banish all the consecrated terms which express them. Now, this is contradictory. With the peculiar and characteristic language would vanish the peculiar and characteristic doctrines. But, apart from this consequence, it is strange that Mr. Foster should overlook the analogical justification of a separate terminology derived from so many similar cases of far less importance. For example, who complains of the Platonic theology for its peculiar vocabulary? Or what reproach has it ever been to Jamblichus, to Proclus, to Plotinus, to Synesius, &c., that they wrote almost a sealed dialect to the “profane,”—that is, to all the uninitiated?

Page 95.

I may add, as equal with the very foremost of them, Immanuel Kant, whose Latin is of the best philosophic character. He had studied as a fellow-pupil with the celebrated Latinist, Ruhnkenius, and had a true sense of elegance in this particular accomplishment. By the way, on this occasion I may observe most peremptorily that Hobbes was a villainous writer of Latin, and the common story of Lord Bacon's value for him in that character is undoubtedly false. Hobbes was amongst the hacks employed occasionally by Lord Bacon; but not a line of the Latin "De Augmentis" could have been written by Hobbes. As Falconbridge says of his reputed father, "Could he have made this leg? We know his workmanship"

Page 95

Lord Bacon's style is so much moulded by his own peculiar plastic intellect that it is difficult to separate the elements of the total compound,—that part which represented individually himself, and that which represented his era and his position as a revolutionary philosopher. But from the plainer and less splendid, though perhaps more sublime, mind of Des Cartes, we receive a diction which better reflects the general standard of his era. Of this diction I venture to pronounce that, though far removed from classical Latinity, it is equally far from the other extreme of barbarism, and has an indoles, or genus sui generis, and its own peculiar laws.

Page 107.

The criticisms which Dr Parr received upon his epitaphs he bore impatiently. He had lofty notions, with which few people had much sympathy, on the dignity of his art. magnifico apostolatum meum was his motto. And in reality, having cultivated it a good deal, and meditated on it still more, he had naturally come to perceive truths and relations of truth (for everything intellectual yields, upon investigation, a world of new views) to which men in general were blind from mere defect of practice and attention. This fretted him, and in some instances it must be acknowledged that the criticisms were both frivolous and vexatious. Could it be credited that Charles Fox, who wrote very passable Greek verses, and other scholars as good, were actually unacquainted with the true Roman sense of the word Probabilis? Dr Parr had described Johnson as probabilis poeta—meaning, of course, a respectable poet—one that wrote creditably, one upon whom a smiling or indulgent toleration might settle. This is the true and sole use of the word in classical Latinity. Ratio probabilis is an argument, &c., such as the understanding can submit to—a decent and respectable argument, in contradistinction to one that commands instant and universal assent. So, again, the elegant Gravina, in a passage now lying open before me, says Probabilis orator, for a pretty good speaker. But Dr Parr's critics clearly understood the word as synonymous with versimilis, or else as answering to the English word probable, in the sense of having an overbalance of chances in its favour. Horresco referens! such a use of the word probabilis would be the merest dog-Latin, and Dr. Parr would justly have selected his most tingling birch for the suppression of the rebellious scoundrel who could use it.

Page 111

Dr Parr adds—"and who had endeavoured to loosen the strongest obligations of morality" These words are likely to be overlooked, as though they were thrown in merely to round the rhythmus of the sentence, or (if really significant) importing not more than that relaxation of morals which naturally accompanies the shaking off religious sanctions. But more is meant than this, and there is a mystery in the matter which I cannot fathom For elsewhere (vol. iii p. 378) he speaks of the destructive consequences of Hume's Essays "to the sacred interests of morality"; and still more pointedly in another place (on Politics, Jurisprudence, &c, vol. iii p 283) he speaks of Hume as having "taught the inconsiderate and the innocent to think with diminished horror not of adultery only, but of other impurities too flagitious to be named" What does he mean?

Page 111

It is usually taken for granted that Hurd had nothing to say for himself in this case, and was on that account discreetly silent. But this is a mistake. He had enough to allege against Jortin and Leland to have turned the tables on their champion, but his motive for silence was perhaps this. Parr threatened that, if answered, he would come back "again and again" upon the same ground; and, if treated with sneers, he protested that he would give "no quarter." Now, in such a war, Hurd would have had his hands tied by the restraints of his episcopal dignity.

Page 113

Mr. Kett, whose position in Oxford enabled him to overlook the whole game, came to the same conclusion, for, in dissuading Dr. Parr from coming forward as an active participator in the dispute, he says, "I cannot help considering the whole affair as containing something necessarily injurious to the reputation of all who engage in it." He also admonished the Doctor "that the unconditional manner in which he gave his assistance ought to induce him to be silent." What Mr. Kett meant by silence was abstinence from the press; but the same reasons applied to oral communications, and in that sense it was no longer possible for Dr. Parr to be silent. He had chattered too much.

ANECDOTAGE :

MISS HAWKINS'S ANECDOTES<sup>1</sup>

THIS orange we mean to squeeze for the public use. Where an author is poor, this is wrong ; but, Miss Hawkins being upon her own acknowledgment rich (p. 125), keeping “ a carriage, to the propreté of which she is not indifferent ” (p. 253), and being able to give away manors worth more than £1000 per annum (p. 140), it is most clear that her interests ought to bend to those of the public ; the public being really in very low circumstances, and quite unable to buy books of luxury and anecdotage.

Who is the author, and what is the book ? The author has descended to us from the last century, and has heard of little that has happened since the American war. She is the daughter of Sir John Hawkins, known to the world, 1st, as the historian of music, 2d, as the acquaintance and biographer of Dr. Johnson, 3d, as the object of some vulgar

<sup>1</sup> Appeared originally in the London Magazine for March 1823, with the signature “ X Y. Z ”, and with the same title as at present, save that after the word “ Anecdotage ” there came “ No. I,” as if by way of indication that there were to be more articles of the same sort under that heading. None such followed, however. The book reviewed was “ Anecdotes, Biographical Sketches, and Memours, collected by Letitia Matilda Hawkins, vol. i. London, F. C. & J. Rivington, 1823.” In reprinting the paper in 1859 in vol. xiii. of the collected writings, De Quincey made some slight modifications of the original text. As the paper contains particles of literary biography, the present volume seems the fit place for it in this edition ; and, on chronological grounds, it comes naturally after that on Dr Parr. See an apologetic reference to the paper by De Quincey himself, ante, vol. iii. p. 175.—M.

gossip and calumnies made current by Mr. Boswell.<sup>1</sup> Her era being determined, the reader can be at no loss to deduce the rest: her chronology known, all is known. She belongs to the litterati of those early ages who saw Dr Johnson in the body, and conversed in the flesh with Goldsmith, Garrick, Bennet Langton, Wilkes and Liberty, Sir Joshua, Hawkesworth, &c &c. All of these good people she “found” (to use her own lively expression) at her father’s house: that is, upon her earliest introduction to her father’s drawing-room at Twickenham, most of them were already in possession. Amongst the “&c &c,” as we have classed them, were some who really ought not to have been thus slurred over, such as Bishop Percy, Tyrwhitt, Dean Tucker, and Hurd: but others absolutely pose us. For instance, does the reader know anything of one Israel Mauduit? We profess to know nothing, no, nor at all the more for his having been the author of Considerations on the German War (p 7): in fact, there have been so many German wars since Mr Mauduit’s epoch, and the public have since then been called on to “consider” so many “considerations,” that Miss Hawkins must pardon us for declaring that the illustrious Mauduit (though we remember his name in Lord Orford’s Memoirs) is now defunct, and that his works have followed him.<sup>2</sup> Not less defunct than Mauduit is the not less illustrious Brettell. Brettell! What Brettell? What Brettell! Why, “Wonderful old Colonel Brettell of the Middlesex Militia (p. 10), who, on my requesting him, at eighty-five years of age, to be careful in getting over a five-barred gate, replied, Take care of what? Time was when I could have jumped over it.” “Time was!” he says, was; but how will that satisfy posterity? What proof has the nineteenth century that he did it, or could have done it? So much for Brettell and Mauduit. But last comes one who “hight Costard”: and here we are posed indeed. Can this be Shakspere’s Costard—everybody’s Costard—the Costard of Love’s Labour’s Lost? But how is that possible? says a grave and learned friend at our elbow. I will affirm it to be impossible. How can any man celebrated by Shakspeare have visited at Twickenham with Dr. Johnson? That indeed, we answer, deserves consideration; yet, if he can, where would Costard be more naturally found than at Sir John Hawkins's house, who had himself annotated on Shakspeare, and lived in company with so many other annotators, as Percy, Tyrwhitt, Steevens, &c? Yet again, at p. 10, and at p. 24, he is called "the learned Costard." Now this is an objection; for Shakspeare's Costard, the old Original Costard, is far from learned. But what of that? He had plenty of time to mend his manners, and fit himself for the company of Dr. Johnson: and at p. 80, where Miss Hawkins again affirms that his name was "always preceded by the epithet learned," she candidly admits that "he was a feeble, ailing, emaciated man, who had all the appearance of having sacrificed his health to his studies,"—as well he might, if he had studied from Shakspeare's time to Dr. Johnson's. With all his learning, however, Costard could make nothing of a case which occurred in Sir John Hawkins's grounds; and we confess that we can make no more of it than Costard. "In a paddock," says Miss Hawkins, "we had an oblong piece of water supplied by a sluice. Keeping poultry, this was very convenient for ducks: on a sudden, a prodigious consternation was perceived among the ducks: they were with great difficulty persuaded to take to the water; and, when there, shuddered, grew wet, and were drowned. They were supposed diseased; others were bought at other places; but in vain! none of our ducks could swim. I remember the circumstance calling out much thought and conjecture. The learned George Costard, Dr. Morton, and the medical advisers<sup>1</sup> of the neighbourhood, were consulted: every one

<sup>1</sup> Sir John Hawkins (1719-1789) published his History of Music in 1776, and his Life of Dr. Johnson in 1787. There is a good deal about him in Boswell’s Johnson—M

<sup>2</sup> Israel Mauduit (1708-1787) was the author, in addition to the book here mentioned, of one entitled A Short View of the History of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay (1774).—M.

<sup>1</sup> From this it should seem that Costard was a duck doctor: we remember also a History of Astronomy by one Costard. These facts we mention merely as hints for inquiry to the editors of the next Variorum Shakspeare.—[As this note appeared in the original paper of 1823, it is clear that De Quincey, while making so much fun of the name of Costard, knew something of the man to whom it belonged. He was the Rev. George Costard, who died 1782, author not only of a History of Astronomy (1767), but also of several books of Oriental philology,

“ had a different supposition ; and I well recollect my own “ dissatisfaction with all I heard It was told of course to “ Mr. and Mrs. Garrick Mrs. Garrick would not give credit “ to it : Garrick himself was not incredulous ; and, after a “ discussion, he turned to my father with his jocose impetu“ osity, and said, ‘ There’s my wife, who will not believe the “ story of these ducks, and yet she believes in the eleven “ thousand virgins’ ” Most probably the ducks were descended from that “ which Samuel Johnson trod on,” which, “ if it had lived and had not died, had surely been an odd one ” : its posterity therefore would be odd ones.
 However, Costard could make nothing of it and to this hour the case is an unsolved problem, like the longitude of the north-west passage Perhaps a water-snake lay basking in the pond.

Of Lord Orford,<sup>1</sup> who, like Costard, was a neighbour and an acquaintance of her father’s, Miss Hawkins gives us a very long account ; no less than thirty pages (pp 87-117) being dedicated to him on his first introduction. Amongst his eccentricities, she mentions that “ he made no scruple of avowing his thorough want of taste for Don Quixote.” This was already known from the Walpoliana ; where it may be seen that his objection was singularly disingenuous, because built on an incident (the windmill adventure) which, if it were as extravagant as it seems (though it has been palliated by the peculiar appearance of Spanish mills), is yet of no weight, because not characteristic of the work . it contradicts its general character. We shall extract her account of Lord Orford’s person and aboard, his dress and his address, which is remarkably lively and picturesque, as might have been expected from the pen of a female observer, who was at that time young.—

“ His figure was, as every one knows, not merely tall, but “ more properly long, and slender to excess ; his complexion, “ and particularly his hands, of a most unhealthy paleness.

and with a reputation for Oriental learning which procured him, while alive, the name of “ Rabbi Costard.”—M.]

<sup>1</sup> Horace Walpole (1717-1797), known as fourth Earl of Orford during the last six years of his life, having succeeded to the title in 1791 by the death of his nephew.—M.

“ I speak of him before the year 1772. His eyes were “ remarkably bright and penetrating, very dark and lively .
 “ his voice was not strong ; but his tones were extremely “ pleasant, and (if I may so say) highly gentlemanly. I do “ not remember his common gait . he always entered a room “ in that style of affected delicacy which fashion had then “ made almost natural , chapeau bras between his hands, as if “ he wished to compress it, or under his arm ; knees bent ;
 “ and feet on tip-toe, as if afraid of a wet floor His dress “ in visiting was most usually (in summer when I most saw “ him) a lavender suit ; the waistcoat embroidered with a “ little silver, or of white silk worked in the tambour ; “ partridge silk stockings , and gold buckles , ruffles and “ full generally lace I remember, when a child, thinking “ him very much under-dressed if at any time, except in “ mourning, he wore hemmed cambric. In summer, no “ powder ; but his wig combed straight, and showing his “ very smooth pale forehead, and queued behind ; in winter,
 “ powder ”—What an amusing old coxcomb !<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Further on in the volume we have five more pages (pp 307-312) on the same noble author , to say nothing of three beginning at p. 278, which are imagined by Miss Hawkins to concern Horace Walpole, but which in fact relate, by every word and syllable, to his brother Sir Edward Walpole, and to him only . In both the first and last introduction of Lord Orford, Miss Hawkins contrives to be most amusingly and perversely wrong in all her criticisms, both as relates to his works and to his place in the public esteem . I Lord Orford's tragedy (The Mysterious Mother) is not the “noxious performance” which she supposes, nor is it a work of any genius. It has no merits which can ever bring it upon the stage , nor, if it were brought upon the stage, would it therefore be “tune for the virtuous to fly their country, and leave it a prey to wild beasts ” In his choice of a subject, Lord Orford showed a singular defect of judgment ; in his treatment of it, he is not intentionally immoral. With depraved taste and feeble sensibilities he is chargeable ; but not, as Miss Hawkins asserts, with an act of “enormous indecency.” <sup>2</sup> The Castle of Otranto is not “a new creation in literature,” as she seems to concede (p 309) . on the contrary, it is a most weak and extravagant fiction, in which the coarse, the clumsy, the palpable, and the material, are substituted for the aerial, the spiritual, and the shadowy ; the supernatural agency being, as Mr. Hazlitt has most happily expressed it (Lectures on the Comic Writers, p. 253), “the pasteboard machinery of a pantomime ” <sup>3</sup>. With respect to the Chatterton case, Miss Hawkins is wide of the truth by a whole climate . She dates Lord Orford's declension “in the

Of Dr Johnson, we have but one anecdote ; but it is very good ; and good in the best way—because characteristic ; being, in fact, somewhat brutal, and very witty. Miss Knight, the author of Dinardas and of Marcus Flaminius, called to pay him a farewell visit on quitting England for the Continent. this lady (then a young lady) is remarkably large in person ; so the old savage dismissed her with the following memorial of his good-nature.—“Go, go, my dear ; for you are too big for an island” As may be supposed, the Doctor is no favourite with Miss Hawkins. but she is really too hard upon our old friend ; for she declares “that she never heard him say in any visit six words that could compensate for the trouble of getting to his den, and the disgust of seeing such squalidness as she saw nowhere else” One thing at least Miss Hawkins might have learned from Dr. Johnson ; and let her not suppose that we say it in ill-nature. she might have learned to weed her pages of many barbarisms in language which now disfigure them, for instance, the barbarism of “compensate for the trouble”—in public favour from the time when he resisted the imposition of Chatterton” ; and she thinks it “not the usual justice of the world to be angry at a resistance proved so reasonable. But, first, Lord Orford has not declined in the public favour he ranks higher now than he did in Chatterton’s lifetime, or his own his reputation is the same in kind as the genuine reputation of Voltare. both are very spirited memoir writers ; and, of the two, Lord Orford is the more brilliant. The critique of his posthumous memoirs by Miss Hawkins’s brother expresses his pretensions very ably. Secondly, if he had declined, it could not have been in the way supposed. Nobody blamed Lord Orford for resisting the imposition of Chatterton. He was right in refusing to be hoaxed. he was not right in detaining Chatterton’s papers ; and, if he did this, not through negligence or inattention, but presuming on Chatterton’s rank (as Chatterton himself believed and told him), his conduct was infamous. Be this as it may, his treatment of Chatterton whilst living was arrogant, supercilious, and with little or no sensibility to his claims as a man of genius ; of Chatterton when dead, brutal, and of inhuman hypocrisy ; he himself being one of the few men in any century who had practised at a mature age that very sort of forgery which in a boy of seventeen he represented as unpardonable. Did he, or did he not, introduce his own Castle of Otranto as a translation from an Italian MS. of one Onufrio Muralto ? Do I complain of that masquerading ? Not at all but I say that the same indulgence which shelters Horace, Earl of Orford, justifies Chatterton.

the very sentence before us—instead of “compensate the trouble.”

Dr. Farmer<sup>1</sup> disappointed Miss Hawkins by “the homeliness of his external.” But surely, when a man comes to that supper at which he does not eat but is eaten, we have a deeper interest in his wit, which may chance to survive him, than in his beauty, which posterity cannot possibly enjoy any more than the petits soupers which it adorned. Had the Doctor been a very Adonis, he could not have done Miss Hawkins so much service as by two of his propos which she records:—One was, that, on a report being mentioned, at her father’s table, of Sir Joshua Reynolds having shared the gains arising from the exhibition of his pictures with his man-servant, who was fortunately called Ralph, Dr. Farmer quoted against Sir Joshua these two lines from Hudibras,—

“ A squire he had whose name was Ralph,
Who in the adventure went his half.”

The other was that, speaking of Dr. Parr, he said that “he seemed to have been at a feast of learning (for learning read languages) from which he had carried off all the scraps.” Miss Hawkins does not seem to be aware that this is taken from Shakspeare: but, what is still more surprising, she declares herself “absolutely ignorant whether it be praise or censure.” All we shall say on that question is that we most seriously advise her not to ask Dr. Parr.<sup>2</sup>

Of Paul Whitehead<sup>3</sup> we are told that his wife “was so nearly idiotic that she would call his attention in conversation to look at a cow, not as one of singular beauty, but in the words—‘Mr. Whitehead, there’s a cow.’” On this Miss Hawkins moralizes in a very eccentric way: “He took it,” says she, “most patiently, as he did all such trials of his

<sup>1</sup> Richard Farmer, D.D. (1735-1797), author of An Essay on the Learning of Shakspeare.—M.

<sup>2</sup> As the wording here shows, Miss Hawkins was still alive, as well as Dr. Parr, when this paper was written. She published her Memoirs in more complete form in 1827.—M.

<sup>3</sup> Paul Whitehead, poet and miscellaneous writer, 1709-1774, of whom the satirist Churchill wrote—

“ May I (can worse disgrace on manhood fall ?)
Be born a Whitehead, and baptized a Paul ! ”—M.

temper." Trials of his temper! why, was he jealous of the cow? Had he any personal animosity to the cow? Not only, however, was Paul very patient (at least under his bovine afflictions, and his "trials" in regard to horned cattle), but also Paul was very devout; of which he gave this pleasant assurance: "When I go," said he, "into St. Paul's, I admire it as a very fine, grand, beautiful building; and, when I have contemplated its beauty, I come out: but, if I go into Westminster Abbey, d—n me, I'm all devotion." So, by his own account, Paul appears to have been a very pretty fellow; d—d patient, and d—d devout.

For practical purposes, we recommend to all physicians the following anecdote, which Sir Richard Jebb used to tell of himself: as Miss Hawkins observes, it makes even rapacity comical, and it suggests a very useful and practical hint. "He was attending a nobleman, from whom he had a right to expect a fee of five guineas; he received only three. Suspecting some trick on the part of the steward, from whom he received it, he at the next visit contrived to drop the three guineas. They were picked up, and again deposited in his hand: but he still continued to look on the carpet. His lordship asked if all the guineas were found. 'There must be two guineas still on the carpet,' replied Sir Richard, 'for I have but three.' The hint was taken as he meant."<sup>1</sup>

But, of all medical stratagems, commend us to that practised by Dr. Munckley, who had lived with Sir J. Hawkins during his bachelor days in quality of "chum": and a chum he was, in Miss Hawkins's words, "not at all calculated to render the chum state happy." This Dr. Munckley, by the bye, was so huge a man-mountain that Miss Hawkins supposes the blank in the well-known epigram, <sup>1</sup> I have heard a much neater modern version of the same story, thus:—A rich patient, who had long paid two guineas to his doctor for every visit, thought it time to descend to the single guinea. When the doctor, at next visit, received the single guinea, he held it in his hand, but stooped and fumbled on the hearthrug, as if looking for something. "What are you looking for, doctor?" asked the patient. "O, I have dropped the other guinea," said the doctor. "No, no, doctor," was the answer, "it is I who have dropped that."—M.

“When —— walks the streets, the paviors cry ‘God bless you, Sir!’ and lay their rammers by,”

to have been originally filled up with his name,—but in this she is mistaken. The epigram was written before he was born; and for about 140 years has this empty epigram, like other epigrams to be let, been occupied by a succession of big men: we believe that the original tenant was Dr. Ralph Bathurst. Munckley, however, might have been the original tenant, if it had pleased God to let him be born eighty years sooner, for he was quite as well qualified as Bathurst to draw down the blessings of paviors, and to play the part of a “three-man beetle”<sup>1</sup> Of this Miss Hawkins gives a proof which is dull enough. “Accidentally encountering suddenly a stout man-servant in a narrow passage, they literally stuck” Each, like Horatius Cocles, in the words of Seneca, solus implevit pontis angustias One of them, it is clear, must have backed; unless, indeed, they are sticking there yet. It would be curious to ascertain which of them backed. For the dignity of science, one would hope it was not Munckley Yet we fear he was capable of any meanness, if Miss Hawkins reports accurately his stratagems upon her father’s purse. A direct attack failing, he attacked it indirectly But Miss Hawkins shall tell her own tale “He was extremely rapacious, and a very bad economist, “and, soon after my father’s marriage, having been foiled in “his attempt to borrow money of him, he endeavoured to “atone to himself for this disappointment by protracting the “duration of a low fever in which he attended him; making “unnecessary visits, and with his hand ever open for a fee.” Was there ever such a fellow on this terraqueous globe? Sir John’s purse not yielding to a storm, he approaches by mining and sapping, under cover of a low fever. Did this Munckley really exist; or is he but the coinage of Miss Hawkins’s brain? If the reader wishes to know what became of this “great” man, we will gratify him He was “foiled,” as we have seen, “in his attempt to borrow money” of Sir J. H. he was also soon after “foiled” in his attempt to live. Munckley, big Munckley, being “too big for an island" we suppose, was compelled to die: he gave up the ghost. and, what seems very absurd both to us and to Miss Hawkins, he continued talking to the last, and went off in the very act of uttering a most prosaic truism, which yet happened to be false in his case for his final words were, that it was "hard to be taken off just then, when he was beginning to get into practice." Not at all, with such practices as his where men enter into partnerships with low fevers, it is very fit that they should "back" out of this world as fast as possible, as fast as, in all probability, he had backed down the narrow passage before the stout manservant. So much for Munckley—big Munckley.

<sup>1</sup> “Fillip me with a three-man beetle.”—Falstaff, Henry IV.

It does not strike us as any "singular feature" (p. 273), in the history of Bartleman, the great singer,<sup>1</sup> "that he lived to occupy the identical house in Berners Street in which his first patron resided." Knowing the house, its pros and cons, its landlord, &c, surely it was very natural that he should avail himself of his knowledge for his own convenience. But it is a very singular fact (p. 160) that our Government should, "merely for want of caution, have sent the Culloden ship of war to convoy Cardinal York from Naples" This we suppose Miss Hawkins looks upon as ominous of some disaster; for she considers it "fortunate" that his Eminence "had sailed before it arrived." Of this same Cardinal York Miss Hawkins tells us further that a friend of hers, having been invited to dine with him, as all Englishmen were while he kept a table, "found him, as all "others did, a good-natured, almost superannuated gentleman, who had his round of civilities and jokes. He "introduced some roast beef by saying that it might not be "as good as that in England, for, said he, you know we are "but pretenders" Yes, the Cardinal was a pretender, but his beef was "legitimate"; unless, indeed, his bulls pretended to be oxen.

On the subject of the Pretender, by the way, we have (at p. 63) as fine a bon-mot as the celebrated toast of Dr. Byrom, the Manchester Jacobite. "The Marchioness (the "Marchioness of Tweeddale) had been Lady Frances Carteret, "a daughter of the Earl of Granville, and had been brought

<sup>1</sup> Francis Bartleman, alias Barthélemon, b 1731, d 1808.— M.

“ up by her Jacobite aunt, Lady Worsley, one of the most “ zealous of that party. The Marchioness herself told my “ father that, on her aunt’s upbraiding her when a child with “ not attending prayers, she answered that she heard her “ ladyship did not pray for the King ‘Not pray for the “ King?’ said Lady Worsley; ‘who says this? I will have “ you and those who sent you know that I do pray for the “ King; but I do not think it necessary to tell God Almighty “ who is king’ ”

This is navveté, which becomes wit to the bystander, though simply the natural expression of the thought to him who utters it. Another instance, no less lively, is the following, mentioned at Strawberry Hill by “the sister of one of our first statesmen, now deceased” “She had heard “ a boy, humoured to excess, tease his mother for the remains “ of a favourite dish: manima at length replied, ‘Then do “ take it, and have done teasing me.’ He then flew into a “ passion, roaring out, ‘What did you give it me for? I “ wanted to have snatched it’ ”

The next passage we shall cite relates to a very eminent character indeed, truly respectable, and entirely English, viz Plum-pudding. The obstinate and inveterate ignorance of Frenchmen on this subject is well known. Their errors are grievous, pitiable, and matter of scorn and detestation to every enlightened mind. In civilisation, in trial by jury, and many other features of social happiness, it has been affirmed that the French are two centuries behind us. We believe it. But with regard to plum-pudding they are at least five centuries in arrear. In the Omnia, we think it is, Mr. Southey has recorded one of their insane attempts at constructing such a pudding: the monstrous abortion which on that occasion issued to the light the reader may imagine, and will be at no loss to understand that volley of “Drables,” “Sacres,” and “Morbleus,” which it called forth, when we mention that these deluded Frenchmen made cheese the basis of their infernal preparation. Now, under these circumstances of national infatuation, how admirable must have been the art of an English party who, in the very city of Paris (that centre of darkness on this interesting subject), and in the very teeth of Frenchmen, did absolutely extort from French hands a real English plum-pudding: yes! compelled a French apothecary, unknowing what he did, to produce an excellent plum-pudding, and had the luxury of a hoax into the bargain. Verily, the ruse was magnifique, and, though it was nearly terminating in bloodshed, yet, doubtless, so superb a story would have been cheaply purchased by one or two lives. Here it follows in Miss Hawkins's own words:—"Dr Schomberg of Reading, in the early part of his life, spent a Christmas at Paris with some English friends. They were desirous to celebrate the season in the manner of their own country, by having, as one dish at their table, an English plum-pudding; but no cook was found equal to the task of compounding it. A clergyman of the party had indeed an old receipt-book; but this did not sufficiently explain the process. Dr. Schomberg, however, supplied all that was wanting, by throwing the recipe into the form of a prescription, and sending it to an apothecary to be made up. To prevent all possibility of error, he directed that it should be boiled in a cloth, and sent in the same cloth, to be applied at an hour specified. At this hour it arrived, borne by the apothecary's assistant, and preceded [sweet heavens!] by the apothecary himself, drest, according to the professional formality of the time, with a sword. Seeing, when he entered the apartment, instead of signs of sickness, a table well filled, and surrounded by very merry faces, he perceived that he was made a party in a joke that turned on himself, and indignantly laid his hand on his sword; but an invitation to taste his own cookery appeased him; and all was well."

This story we pronounce altogether unique: for, as, on the one hand, the art was divine by which the benefits of medical punctuality and accuracy were pressed into the service of a Christmas dinner, so, on the other hand, it is strictly and satirically probable when told of a French apothecary: for who but a Frenchman, whose pharmacopœia still teems with the monstrous compounds of our ancestors, could have believed that such a preparation was seriously designed for a cataplasm?

In our next extracts we come upon ground rather tender and unsafe for obstinate sceptics. We have often heard of learned doctors,—from Shrewsbury, suppose,—going by way of Birmingham to Oxford, and at Birmingham, under the unfortunate ambiguity of “the Oxford coach,” getting into that from Oxford, which, by nightfall, safely restored the astonished doctor to astonished Shrewsbury. Such a case is sad and pitiful, but what is that to the case (p. 164) of Wilkes the painter, who, being “anxious to get a likeness” of “good Dr. Foster” (the same whom Pope has honoured with the couplet,— attended his meeting one Sunday evening,” and very naturally, not being acquainted with Dr. Foster’s person, sketched a likeness of the clergyman whom he found officiating; which clergyman happened unfortunately to be—not the doctor—but Mr. Morris, an occasional substitute of his. The mistake remained undiscovered: the sketch was elaborately copied in a regular picture the picture was elaborately engraved in mezzotinto; and to this day the portrait of one Mr. Morris “officiates” for that of the celebrated Dr. Foster. Living and dead, he was Dr. Foster’s substitute. Even this, however, is a trifle to what follows. the case “of a Baronet, “who must be nameless, who proposed to visit Rome, and “previously to learn the language, but by some mistake, or “imposition, engaged a German, who taught only his own “language, and proceeded in the study of it vigorously for “three months before he discovered his error.” With all deference to the authority of Horace Walpole, from whom the anecdote originally comes, we confess that we are staggered; and must take leave, in the stoical phrase, to “suspend”: in fact, we must consult our friends before we can contract for believing it: at present, all we shall say about it is that we greatly fear the Baronet “must,” as Miss Hawkins observes, “be nameless.”

“Let modest Foster, if he will, excel Ten metropolitans in preaching well”)

We must also consult our friends on the propriety of believing the little incident which follows, though attributed to “a very worthy modest young man” for it is remarkable that of this very modest young man is recorded but one act, viz the most impudent in the book. “He was walking in the Mall

“ of St James’s Park, when they met two fine young women, drest in straw hats, and, at least to appearance, unattended. His friend offered him a bet that he did not go up to one of those rustic beauties, and salute her. He accepted the bet ; and in a very civil manner, and probably explaining the cause of his boldness, he thought himself sure of success, when he became aware that it was the Princess Caroline, daughter of George II, who, with one of her sisters, was taking the refreshment of a walk in complete disguise. In the utmost confusion he bowed, begged pardon, and retreated ; whilst their Royal Highnesses, with great good humour, laughed at his mistake.”

We shall conclude our extracts with the following story, as likely to interest our fair readers.—

“ Lady Lucy Meyrick was by birth the Lady Lucy Pitt, daughter to the Earl of Londonderry, and sister to the last who bore that title. She was, of course, nearly related to all the great families of that name, and, losing her parents very early in life, was left under the guardianship of an uncle, who lived in James Street, Buckingham Gate. This house was a most singularly uncouth dismal dwelling, in appearance very much of the Vanburgh style of building ; and the very sight of it would justify almost any measure to get out of it. It excited every one’s curiosity to ask What is this place ? What can it be for ? It had a front of very dark heavy brick-work ; very small windows, with sashes immensely thick. In this gay mansion, which looked against the blank window side of the large house in St. James’s Park, twenty years ago Lord Milford’s, but backwards into a market-gardener’s ground, was Lady Lucy Meyrick to reside with her uncle and his daughter, a girl a little older than herself. The young ladies, who had formed a strict friendship, were kept under great restraint, which they bore as two lively girls may be supposed to have done. Their endurances soon reached the ear of two Westminster scholars, of one of the Welsh families of Meyrick, who, in the true spirit of knight-errantry, concerted with them a plan for escaping, which they carried into effect. Having gone thus far, there was nothing for the courteous knights to do but to marry the fair damsels

“ to whom they had rendered this essential service ; and for “ this purpose they took them to the Fleet, or to May-Fair, in “ both which places marriages were solemnised in the utmost “ privacy. Here the two couples presented themselves ; a “ baker’s wife attending upon the ladies. Lady Lucy was “ then, and to the end of her life, one of the smallest women
“ I ever saw : she was at the same time not more than “ fourteen years of age ; and, being in the dress of a child,
“ the person officiating objected to performing the ceremony
“ for her. This extraordinary scrupulosity was distressing , “ but her ladyship met it by a lively reply—that her cousin “ might be married first, and then lend her her gown, which “ would make her look more womanly : but I suppose her “ right of precedence was regarded ; for she used to say her“ self that she was at last married in the baker’s wife’s gown.
“ Yet, even now, if report be true, an obstacle intervened :
“ the young ladies turned fickle ; not, indeed, on the question “ ‘ to be or not to be ’ married, but on their choice of “ partners ; and I was assured that they actually changed—“ Lady Lucy taking to herself, or acquiescing in taking, the “ elder brother. What their next step was to have been
“ I know not : the ladies, who had not been missed, returned “ to their place of endurance ; the young gentlemen to school, “ where they remained, keeping the secret close. When the “ school next broke up, they went home : and, probably, “ whilst waiting for courage to avow, or opportunity to dis“ close, or accident to betray for them the matter, a newly “ arrived guest fresh from London, in reply, perhaps, to the “ usual question—What news from town ? reported an odd “ story of two Westminster scholars, names unknown, who “ had (it was said) married two girls in the neighbourhood “ of the school. The countenances of the two lads drew “ suspicions upon them ; and, confession being made, Lady “ Lucy was fetched to the house of her father-in-law. His “ lady, seeing her so very much of a child in appearance, “ said, on receiving her, in a tone of vexation—‘ Why, child, “ what can we do with you ? Such a baby as you are, what “ can you know ? ’ With equal humility and frankness “ Lady Lucy replied—‘ It is very true, Madam, that I am “ very young and very ignorant ; but whatever you will “teach me I will learn.’ All the good lady’s prejudice was “now overcome, and Lady Lucy’s conduct proved the “sincerity of her submission. She lived seven years in “Wales under the tuition of her mother-in-law, conforming “to the manners, tempers, and prejudices of her new “relations.”

We have now “squeezed” a volume of 351 pages, according to our promise: we hope Miss Hawkins will forgive us. She must also forgive us for gently blaming her diction. She says (p. 277), “I read but little English.” We thought as much, and wish she read more. The words “duple” (p. 145), “decadence” (p. 123), and “cumbent,” all point to another language than English: as to “marux” (p. 254), we know not what language it belongs to, unless it be Coptic. It is certainly not “too big for an island”; but it will not do for this island, and we beg it may be transported. Miss Hawkins says a worse thing, however, of the English language than that she reads it but little: “instead of admiring my native language,” says she, “I feel fettered by it.” That may be; but her inability to use it without difficulty and constraint is the very reason why she ought not to pronounce upon its merits. we cannot allow of any person’s deciding on the value of an instrument until he has shown himself master of its powers in their whole compass. For some purposes (and those the highest) the English language is a divine instrument: no language is so for all.

When Miss Hawkins says that she reads “little English,” the form of the expression implies that she reads a good deal of some more favoured language. may we take the liberty of asking—what? It is not Welsh, we hope? nor Syriac? nor Sungskrita? We say hope, for none of these will yield her anything for her next volume. throughout the Asiatic Researches no soul has been able to unearth a Sanscrit bon-mot. Is it Latin? or Greek? Perhaps both. for, besides some sprinklings of both throughout the volume, she gives us at the end several copies of Latin and Greek verses. These, she says, are her brother’s. be they whose they may, we must overhaul them. The Latin are chiefly Sapphics, the Greek chiefly Iambics. The following is a specimen of the Sapphics.—

“One a penny, two a penny, hot cross buns ;
 If your daughters will not eat them, give them to your sons ;
 But, if you have none of those pretty little elves,
 You cannot do better than eat them yourselves.”

“Idem Latine redditum a Viro Clariss Henrico Hawkins.

“Asse placentam cupiasne solam ?
 Asse placentas cupiasne binas ?
 Ecce placentæ, teneræ, tepentes,
 Et cruce gratæ.

“Respuant natæ ? dato, quæso, natis :
 Parvulos tales tibi si negârint
 Fata, tu tandem (superest quid ultra ?)
 Sumto . præsto est ”

Our opinion of this translation is that it is worthy of the original. We hope this criticism will prove satisfactory. At the same time, without offence to Mr. Hawkins, may we suggest that the baker's man has rather the advantage in delicacy of expression and structure of verse ? He has also distinguished clearly the alternative of sons and daughters ; which the unfortunate ambiguity of “natis” has prevented Mr. Hawkins from doing. Perhaps Mr. Hawkins will consider this against a future edition. Another, viz. a single hexameter, is entitled, “De Amandâ, clavibus amissis.” Here we must confess to a signal mortification, the table of “Contents” having prepared us to look for some sport ; for the title is there printed (by mistake, as it turns out), “De Amandâ, clavis amissis,” i.e. On Amanda, upon the loss of her cudgels ; whereas it ought to have been clavibus amissis, on the loss of her keys. Shenstone used to thank God that his name was not adapted to the vile designs of the punster : perhaps some future punster may take the conceit out of him on that point by extracting a compound pun from his name combined with some other word. The next best thing, however, to having a name, or title, that is absolutely pun-proof, is the having one which yields only to Greek puns, or Carthaginian (i e Punic) puns. Lady Moira has that felicity ; on whom Mr. Hawkins has thus punned very seriously in a Greek hexameter :—

“On the death of the Countess of Moira's new-born infant ”
 “Μοιρα καλη, μ' ετεκες μ' ανελες μεν, Μοιρα κραταιη ”

That is: "Lovely Moira, thou gavest me birth: thou also, violent Moira, tookest me away": where the first Μοιρα means the Countess, the second is the Greek term for mortal destiny.

Of the iambs we shall give one specimen:—

"Impromptu returned with my lead pencil, which I had left on his table.

" Βοηθος εἰμι καλλιῶ παντ' ἐξ ἔμου'
'Ἐκ του μολιβδου ἡ νοησις ἐρχεται."

(Pencil is supposed to speak) · "I am a ministerial assistant: from me come all things beautiful And thus from lead comes intellectual light."

The second clause will bear another version, which does not heal its exaggeration, in representing all beauty as a product of the lead pencil. And μολιβδος, we fear, which means the common household lead of cisterns, tubes, &c., will not express the plumbago of the artist's pencil

The thought is pretty: some little errors there certainly are, as in the contest with the baker's man; and in this, as in all his iambs (especially in the three from the Arabic), some little hiatuses in the metre, not adapted to the fastidious race of an Athenian audience. But these little hiatuses, these "little enormities" (to borrow a phrase from the sermon of a country clergyman), will occur in the best regulated verses. On the whole, our opinion of Mr Hawkins as a Greek poet is that in seven hundred, or say seven hundred and fifty years, he may become a pretty—yes, we will say, a very pretty poet: as he cannot be more than one-tenth of that age at present, we look upon his performances as singularly promising Tantæ molis erat Romanam condere gentem.<sup>1</sup>

To return to Miss Hawkins; there are some blunders in facts up and down her book. such, for instance, as that of supposing Sir Francis Drake to have commanded in the succession of engagements with the Spanish Armada of 1588; which is the more remarkable, as her own ancestor<sup>1</sup> was so distinguished a person in those engagements. But, upon the whole, her work, if weeded of some trifling tales (as what relates to the young Marquis of Tweeddale's dress, &c.), is creditable to her talents. Her opportunities of observation have been great; she has generally made good use of them; and her tact for the ludicrous is striking and useful in a book of this kind. We hope that she will soon favour us with a second volume<sup>2</sup>; and, in that case, we cannot doubt that we shall again have an orange to squeeze for the public use.

<sup>1</sup> Seriously, however, Mr. Hawkins's translation of Lord Erskine's celebrated punning epigram on Dr. Lettson is "very clever," as Miss Hawkins thinks it, and wants only a little revision. She is mistaken, however, in supposing that Lord Erskine meant to represent Dr. Lettson "as illiterate" · the bad grammar was indispensable to the purpose of working the name—I Lettson (John Coakley Lettson was the full name)—into the texture of the verse; which is accomplished with great ingenuity both in the English and the Greek. [De Quincey

here lops off, in 1859,—perhaps by inadvertence, but certainly with lame effect,—the conclusion of the note as it had stood in 1823. It was as follows:—

“ Is people sick ? to me apply :
 I blisters, bloods, and sweats 'em ;
 If after that they choose to die,
 What's that to me ? I. Lets 'em.”

“ Τίς νοσει ; ἔλθε· νοσῶν πασῶν οἷος τε κρατῆσθαι
 Εἰμι· λελήθε σοφῶν φαρμάκων οὐδὲν ἔμον.
 Ἀλλ', εἰ μὲν θάνατον μετὰ ταῦτα γέ πικρὸν ἔλοιτο, ἘΊΑΕΤ', ΣΩΜ' ἔρρει· οὐδε μὲμνηλεν ἔμοι.”—M.]

<sup>1</sup> The Elizabethan Sir John Hawkins, 1520-1595.—M.

<sup>2</sup> She did in 1827.—M.

THE MARQUESS WELLESLEY <sup>1</sup>

It sounds like the tolling of funeral bells, as the annunciation is made of one death after another amongst those who supported our canopy of empire through the last most memorable generation. The eldest of the Wellesleys is gone; he is gathered to his fathers: and here we have his life circumstantially written.

Who, and of what origin, are the Wellesleys? There is an impression current amongst the public, or there was an impression, that the true name of the Wellesley family is Wesley. This is a case very much resembling some of those imagined by the old scholastic logicians, where it was impossible either to deny or to affirm: saying yes, or saying no, equally you told a falsehood. As if, being asked whether you killed your wife by strychnia, then to reply yes would be directly to own the crime; but, on the other hand, to reply no would be indirectly to own it—since it would be argued that you admitted the killing, by denying that you did it by strychnia. The case as to the Wellesleys is briefly this:—The family was originally English; and in England, at the earliest era, there is no doubt at all that its name was De Wellesleigh, which was pronounced in the eldest times just as it is now—viz. as a dissyllable <sup>2</sup>—the first syllable sound-

<sup>1</sup> In Tait's Edinburgh Magazine for March 1846, in the form of a notice of Mr. Robert R. Pearce's Memoirs and Correspondence of the Marquess, published that year. The paper was reprinted by De Quincey in 1858, in vol. viii of his Collected Writings.—M.

<sup>2</sup> "As a dissyllable":—Just as the Annesley family, of which Lord Valentia is the present head, do not pronounce their name tri-

ing exactly like the cathedral city Wells, in Somersetshire, and the second like lea (a field under some modification). It is plain enough, from various records, that the true historical genesis of the name was precisely through that composition of words which here, for the moment, I had imagined merely to illustrate its pronunciation. Lands in the diocese of Bath and Wells, running up almost to the gates of Bristol, constituted the earliest possessions of the De Wellesleighs. They, seven centuries before Assaye and Waterloo, were "seised" of certain rich leas held under the Dean and Chapter of Wells. And, from these Saxon elements of the name, some have supposed the Wellesleys a Saxon race. They could not possibly have better blood—but still the thing does not follow from the premisses. Neither does it follow from the de that they were Norman. The first De Wellesley known to history, the very tip-top man of the pedigree, is Avenant de Wellesleigh. About a hundred years nearer to our own times—viz. in 1239—came Michael de Wellesleigh, of whom the important fact is recorded that he was the father of Wellerand de Wellesleigh. And what did young Mr. Wellerand perform in this wicked world, that the proud muse of history should condescend to notice his rather singular name five hundred and fifty-five years<sup>1</sup> exactly after his decease? Reader, he was—"killed" that is all; and in company with Sir Robert de Percival; which again argues his Somersetshire descent; for the family of Lord Egmont, the head of all Percivals, ever was, and ever will be, in Somersetshire. But how was he killed? The time when—viz. 1303—the place where, are known; but the manner how is not exactly stated. It was in skirmish with rascally Irish "kernes," fellows that (when presented at the font of Christ for baptism) had their right arms covered up from the baptismal waters, in order that, still remaining consecrated to the devil, those arms might inflict a devilish blow. Such a blow, with such an unbaptized arm, the Irish villain struck; and there was an syllabically (as strangers often suppose)—viz., Ann-es-ley—but as if Anns (in the possessive case)—ley. In Scotland, this ancient English name is altogether transfigured into the Scottish name of Amslie.

<sup>1</sup> "Five hundred and fifty-five years":—i.e. not in the year of original publication, thirteen years ago, but now, in the year of revival and republication—viz. in 1858.

end of Wellerand de Wellesleigh. Strange that history should make an end of a man before she has made a beginning of him. These, however, are the facts; which, in writing a romance about Sir Wellerand and Sir Percival, I shall have great pleasure in falsifying. But how, says the too curious reader, did the De Wellesleighs find themselves amongst Irish kernes? Had these scamps the presumption to invade Somersetshire? Did they dare to intrude into Wells? Not at all. but the pugnacious De Wellesleighs had dared to intrude into Ireland. Some say in the train of Henry II. Some say — but no matter: there they were; and there they stuck like limpets. They soon engrafted themselves into the County of Kildare, from which, by means of a fortunate marriage, they leaped into the County of Meath; and in that county, as if to refute the pretended mutability of human things, they have roosted ever since. There was once a famous copy of verses floating about Europe, which asserted that, whilst other princes were destined to fight for thrones, Austria—the handsome house of Hapsburg—should obtain thrones by marriage:

“Pugnabunt alii: tu, felix Austria, nube.”<sup>1</sup>

So of the Wellesleighs. Sir Wellerand took quite the wrong way: not cudgelling, but courting, was the correct line of policy in Kildare. Two great estates, by two separate marriages, the De Wellesleighs obtained in Kildare; and by a third marriage, in a third generation, they obtained, in the County of Meath, an estate known by the name of Castle Dangan (otherwise Dangan), with lordships as plentiful as blackberries. Castle Dangan came to them in the year of our Lord 1411—i.e. four years before Agincourt; which memorable battle was fought exactly four hundred years before Waterloo—ergo in 1415. And in Castle Dangan did Field-Marshal the Man of Waterloo draw his first breath,

<sup>1</sup> “Nube”.—One must wink at blunders where royalties are concerned; else, between you and me, reader, nube is not the right word, unless when the Austrian throne-winner happened to be a princess. Nube could not be applied to a man, as an old dusty pentameter will assist the reader in remembering shed his first tears, and perpetrate his earliest trespasses. That is what one might call a pretty long spell for one family. Four hundred and thirty-five years<sup>1</sup> has Castle Dangan furnished a nursery for the Wellesley piccaninnies. Amongst the lordships attached to Castle Dangan was Mornington, which, more than three centuries afterwards, supplied an earldom for the grandfather of Waterloo. Any further memorabilia of the Castle Dangan family are not recorded, except that in 1485 (which surely was the year of Bosworth Field ?) they began to omit the de, and to write themselves Wellesley tout court. From indolence, I presume; for a certain Lady Di. le Fleming, whom once I knew, a Howard by birth, who had condescended so far as to marry a simple baronet (Sir Michael le Fleming), told me, when a widow, as her reason for omitting the le, that it caused her too much additional trouble. She was a very good and kind-hearted woman; yet still, as a daughter of the Howards (the great feudal house of Suffolk), she regarded any possible heraldic pretensions of an obscure baronet's family as visible only through powerful microscopes.

“Uxorem duco, nubit at illa mihi.”

So far the evidence seems in favour of Wellesley, and against Wesley. But, on the other hand, during the last three centuries the Wellesleys themselves wrote the name Wesley. They, however, were only the maternal ancestors of the present Wellesleys. Garret Wellesley, the last male heir of the direct line, in the year 1745, left his whole estate to one of the Cowleys, a Staffordshire family, who had emigrated to Ireland in Queen Elizabeth's time, but who were, however, descended from the Wellesleys. This Cowley or Colley, taking, in 1745, the name of Wesley, received from George II the title of Earl Mornington; and Colley's grandson, the Marquess Wellesley of our age, was recorded in the Irish peerage as Wesley, Earl of Mornington, was uniformly so described up to the end of the eighteenth century; and even Arthur of Waterloo, whom most of us Europeans know pretty well, on going to India a little before his brother (say early in 1799), was thus introduced by Lord Cornwallis to Sir John Shore (Lord Teignmouth, at that time the Governor-General), "Dear sir, I beg leave to introduce to you Colonel Wesley, who is a lieutenant-colonel of my regiment. He is a sensible man, and a good officer." Posterity (for we are posterity in respect of Lord Cornwallis) have been very much of his opinion. Colonel Wesley really was a sensible man; and the sensible man, soon after his arrival in Bengal, under the instigation of his brother, resumed the old name of Wellesley. In reality, the name of Wesley was merely the abbreviation of indolence, as Chunley for Cholmondeley, Pomfret for Pontefract, Cicester for Cirencester, or, in Scotland, Marchbanks for Marjoribanks, Shatorow, as commonly pronounced, for the Duke of Hamilton's French title of Chatelherault. I remember well from my days of childhood a niece of John Wesley, the Proto-Methodist, who always spoke of the second Lord Mornington (author of the well-known glees) as a cousin, and as intimately connected with her brother, the great foudroyant performer on the organ. Southey, in his Life of John Wesley, the pious founder of Methodism, tells us that Charles Wesley, the brother of John, and father of the great organist, had the offer from Garret Wellesley of those same estates which eventually were left to Richard Cowley. This argues a recognition of near consanguinity. Why the offer was declined is not distinctly explained. Certainly it requires explanation, being a problem of very difficult solution to us sublunary men. But, if it had been accepted, Southey thinks that then we should have had no storming of Seringapatam, no Waterloo, and no Arminian Methodists. All that is not quite clear. Tippoo was booked for a desperate British vengeance by his own desperate enmity to our name, though no Lord Wellesley had been Governor-General in the penultimate year of the last century. Napoleon, by the same fury of hatred to us, was booked for the same fate, though the scene of it might not have been Waterloo. And, as to John Wesley, why should he not have made the same schism with the English Church because his brother Charles had become unexpectedly rich?

<sup>1</sup> "Four hundred and thirty-five"—but now (1858), on republication of this paper, hard upon four hundred and forty-seven years

The Marquess Wellesley was of the same standing, as to age, or nearly so, as Mr Pitt; though he outlived Pitt by almost forty years. Born in 1760, three or four months before the accession of George III, he was sent to Eton, at the age of eleven, and from Eton, in his eighteenth year, he was sent to Christ Church, Oxford, where he matriculated as a nobleman. He then bore the courtesy title of Viscount Wellesley; but, in 1781, when he had reached his twenty-first year, he was summoned away from Oxford by the death of his father, the second Earl of Mornington. It is interesting, at this moment, to look back on the family group of children collected at Dangan Castle. The young Earl of Mornington, future Marquess Wellesley, was within a month of his majority; his younger brothers and sisters were these: William Wellesley Pole (since dead, under the title of Lord Maryborough), then aged eighteen; Anne, since married to Henry, son of Lord Southampton, then aged thirteen; Arthur, aged twelve, Gerald Valerian, now in the Church, aged ten; Mary Elizabeth (since Lady Culling Smith), aged nine; Henry, since Lord Cowley, and British ambassador to Spain, France, &c, aged eight. The new Lord Mornington showed his conscientious nature, by assuming his father's debts, and by superintending the education of his brothers. He had distinguished himself at Oxford as a scholar; but he returned thither no more, and took no degree. As Earl of Mornington, he sat in the Irish House of Lords; but, not being a British peer, he was able to sit also in the English House of Commons; and of this opening for a more national career he availed himself at the age of twenty-four. Except that he favoured the claims of the Irish Catholics, his policy was pretty uniformly that of Mr. Pitt. He supported that minister throughout the contests on the French Revolution, and, a little earlier, on the Regency question. This came forward in 1788, on occasion of the first insanity which attacked George III. The reader, who is likely to have been born since that era—at least I hope so—will perhaps not be acquainted with the constitutional question then at issue. It was this:—Mr. Fox held that, upon any incapacity arising in the sovereign, the regency would then settle (ipso facto of that incapacity, and, therefore, in defiance of Parliament) upon the Prince of Wales, overlooking altogether the case in which there should be no Prince of Wales, and the case in which such a prince might be as incapable, from youth, of exercising the powers attached to the office as his father from disease. Mr. Pitt denied that a Prince of Wales simply as such, and apart from any moral fitness which he might have manifested, had more of legal title to the office of regent than any lamplighter or scavenger. It was the province of Parliament exclusively to legislate for the particular case.—The practical decision of the question was not called for, through the accident of the king's sudden recovery: but in Ireland, from the independence asserted by the two houses of the British councils, the question grew still more complex. The Lord-Lieutenant refused to transmit their address,<sup>1</sup> and Lord Mornington supported him powerfully in his refusal.

Ten years after this hot collision of parties, Lord Mornington was appointed Governor-General of India; and now first he entered upon a stage worthy of his powers. I cannot myself agree with his biographer, Mr Pearce, that "the wisdom of his policy is now universally recognised"; because the same false view of our Indian position, which at that time caused his splendid services to be slighted in many quarters, still preponderates. All administrations alike have been intensely ignorant of Indian politics, and for the natural reason, that the business of home politics leaves them no disposable energies for affairs so distant, and with which each man's chance of any durable connexion is so exceedingly small. What Lord Mornington did was this: he looked our prospects in the face. Two great enemies were then looming upon the horizon—viz Mysore and the Mahrattas—both brutally ignorant of our real resources, and both deluded by our imperfect use of such resources as, even in a previous war, we had possessed. That one of these enemies who first came into play was Tippoo, the Sultan of Mysore: him, by the crushing energy of his arrangements, Lord Mornington was able utterly to destroy; and to distribute his dominions with equity and moderation; yet so as to prevent any new coalition arising in that quarter against the British power. There is a portrait of Tippoo,—of this very tiger, more than tiger-hearted,—in the second volume of Mr. Pearce's work, which expresses sufficiently the unparalleled ferocity of his nature ; and it is guaranteed, by its origin, as authentic. Tippoo, from the personal interest investing him, has more fixed the attention of Europe than a much more formidable enemy . that enemy was the Mahratta confederacy, chiefly concentrated in the persons of the Peishwah, of Scindia (usually pronounced Sindy), of Holkar, and the Rajah of Berar . Had these four princes been less profoundly ignorant, had they been less inveterately treacherous, they would have cost us the only<sup>1</sup> dreadful struggle which in India we have stood . As it was, Lord Mornington's government reduced and crippled the Mahrattas to such an extent that in 1817 Lord Hastings found it possible to crush them for ever. Three services of a profounder nature Lord Wellesley was enabled to do for India . first, to pave the way for the propagation of Christianity—mighty service, stretching to the clouds, and which, in the hour of death, must have given him consolation , secondly, to enter upon the abolition of such Hindoo superstitions as are most shocking to humanity, particularly the practice of Suttee, and the barbarous exposure of dying persons or of first-born infants at Saugor on the Ganges ; finally, to promote an enlarged system of education, which (if his splendid scheme had been adopted) would have diffused its benefits all over India. It ought also to be mentioned that the expedition by way of the Red Sea against the French in Egypt was so entirely of his suggestion and his preparation that, to the great dishonour of Messrs. Pitt and Dundas,—whose administration, great by its general policy, was the worst as a war administration that ever feebly misapplied or lazily nonapplied the resources of a mighty empire,—it languished for eighteen months purely through their neglect.

<sup>1</sup> Which adopted neither view; for, by offering the regency of Ireland to the Prince of Wales, they negatived Mr Fox's view, who held it to be the prince's by inherent right, whether offered or not, and, on the other hand, they still more openly opposed Mr. Pitt

In 1805, having staid about seven years in India, Lord Mornington was recalled ; was created Marquess Wellesley ; was sent, in 1821, as Viceroy to Ireland, where there was little to do; having previously, in 1809, been sent ambassador to the Spanish Cortes, where there was an infinity to do, but no means of doing it. The last great political act of Lord Wellesley was the smashing of the Peel ministry in 1834—viz. by the famous resolution (which he personally drew up) for appropriating to the great purpose of general education in Ireland whatever surplus might arise from the remodelled revenues of the Irish Church. Full of honours, he retired from public affairs at the age of seventy-five, and, for seven years more of life, dedicated his time to such literary pursuits as he had found most interesting in early youth.

<sup>1</sup> “ The only dreadful struggle ” —This was written thirteen years ago, when the Sikh empire of Lahore was only beginning to be dangerous, and the Lion of Lahore, Runjeet Sing (the Romulus of the Sikhs), was but dimly appreciated by our own officers, when presented to him on their march to and from Afghanistan. Sing means lion.

Mr. Pearce, who is so capable of writing vigorously and sagaciously, has too much allowed himself to rely upon public journals. For example, he reprints the whole of the attorney-general's official information against eleven obscure persons, who, from the gallery of the Dublin theatre, did "wickedly, riotously, and routously"<sup>1</sup> hiss, groan, insult, and assault (to say nothing of their having caused and procured to be hissed, groaned, &c) the Marquess Wellesley, Lord-Lieutenant General, and General Governor of Ireland. This document covers more than nine pages, and, after all, omits the only fact of the least consequence—viz. that several missiles were thrown by the rioters into the viceregal box, and amongst them a quart-bottle, which barely missed his excellency's temples. Considering the impetus acquired by the descent from the gallery, there is little doubt that such a weapon would have killed Lord Wellesley on the spot. In default, however, of this weighty fact, the attorney-general favours us with memorialising the very best piece of doggerel that I remember to have read—viz. that upon divers (to wit, three thousand) papers the rioters had wickedly and maliciously written and printed, besides, observe, causing to be written and printed, "No Popery," as also the following traitorous couplet:—

<sup>1</sup> "Routously":—This is not altogether lawyer's surplusage for, let the hot-blooded reader understand that to be routous is nothing like so criminal in law as to be riotous. I never go beyond the routous point.

“The Protestants want Talbot,
As the Papists have got all but” ;

meaning “all but” that which they got some years later by means of the Clare election in favour of Dan O’Connell. Yet if, in some instances like this, Mr. Pearce has too largely drawn upon official papers, which he should rather have abstracted and condensed, on the other hand, his work has a special value in bringing forward private documents, to which his opportunities have gained him a confidential access. We are indebted to Mr. Pearce also for two portraits of Lord Wellesley, one in middle life, and one in old age from a sketch by the Comte d’Orsay, felicitously executed.

Something remains to be said of Lord Wellesley as a literary man ; and towards such a judgment Mr. Pearce has contributed some very pleasing materials. As a public speaker, Lord Wellesley had that degree of brilliancy and effectual vigour which might have been expected in a man of great talents, possessing much native sensibility to the charms of style, but not led by any personal accidents of life into a separate cultivation of oratory, or into any profound investigation of its duties and its powers on the arena of a British senate. There is less call for speaking of Lord Wellesley in this character, where he did not seek for any eminent distinction, than in the more general character of an elegant littérateur, which furnished to him much of his recreation in all stages of his life, and much of his consolation in the last. It is interesting to see this accomplished nobleman, in advanced age, when other resources were one by one decaying, and the lights of life were successively fading into darkness, still cheering his languid hours by the culture of classical literature, and in his eighty-second year drawing solace from those same pursuits which had given grace and distinction to his twentieth.

One or two remarks I will make upon Lord Wellesley’s verses — Greek, as well as Latin. The Latin lines upon Chantrey’s success at Holkham in killing two woodcocks at the first shot, which subsequently he sculptured in marble, and presented to Lord Leicester, are perhaps the most felicitous amongst the whole. Masquerading, in Lord Wellesley's verses, as Praxiteles, who could not well be represented with a Manton having a percussion lock, Chantrey is armed with a bow and arrows :

“ En ! trajecit aves una sagitta duas.”

In the Greek translation of “ Parthenopœus ” there are as few faults as could reasonably be expected. But, first, one word as to the original Latin poem to whom does it belong ? It is traced first to Lord Grenville, who received it from his tutor (afterwards Bishop of London), who had taken it as an anonymous poem from the “ Censor's book ” ; and, with very little probability, it is doubtfully assigned to “ Lewis of the War Office ”—meaning, no doubt, the father of Monk Lewis. By this anxiety in tracing its pedigree, the reader is led to exaggerate the pretensions of the little poem. These are inconsiderable ; and there is a conspicuous fault, which it is worth while noticing, because it is one peculiarly besetting those who write Latin verses with the help of a gradus—viz. that the Pentameter is often a mere reverberation of the preceding Hexameter. Thus, for instance, and so of others, where the second line is but a variation of the first. Even Ovid, with all his fertility, and partly in consequence of his fertility, too often commits this fault. Where, indeed, the thought is effectually varied, so that the second line acts as a musical minor, succeeding to the major in the first, there may happen to arise a peculiar beauty. But I speak of the ordinary case, where the second is merely the rebound of the first, presenting the same thought in a diluted form. This is the commonest resource of feeble thinking, and is also a standing temptation or snare for feeble thinking. Lord Wellesley, however, is not answerable for these faults in the original, which, indeed, he notices indulgently as “ repetitions ” ; and his own Greek version is spirited and good. There are, however, some mistakes. The second line is altogether faulty.

“ Parthenios inter saltus non amplius erro,
Non repeto Dryadum pascua læta choris ” ;

Χωρια Μαιναλιω παντ' ἐρατεινα θεω
 Ἀχνυμενος λειπων

does not express the sense intended. Construed correctly, this clause of the sentence would mean—"I sorrowfully leaving all places gracious to the Mænalian god"; but that is not what Lord Wellesley designed: "I leaving the woods of Cylene, and the snowy summits of Pholoe, places that are all of them dear to Pan"—that is what was meant; that is to say, not leaving all places dear to Pan—far from it—but leaving a few places, every one of which is dear to Pan. In the line beginning where the meaning is—and if as yet, by reason of my immature age,—there is a metrical error; and ἡλικια will not express immaturity of age. I doubt whether, in the next line,

Καν οὐθ' ὑφ' ἡλικιας,

Μηδ' ἀλκη θαλλοι γουνασιν ἡιθεος, γουνασιν could convey the meaning without the preposition ἐν. And in

Σπερχομαι οὐ καλεουσι θεοι

—I hasten whither the gods summon me—οὐ is not the right word: οὐ is where, or in what place; but the call is for whither, or to what place. It is, however, difficult to write Greek verses which shall be liable to no verbal objections; and the fluent movement of these verses sufficiently argues the off-hand ease with which Lord Wellesley must have read Greek, writing it so elegantly, and with so little of apparent constraint.

Meantime the most interesting (from its circumstances) of Lord Wellesley's metrical attempts, is one to which his own English interpretation of it has done less than justice. It is a Latin epitaph on the daughter (an only daughter) of Lord and Lady Brougham. She died, and (as was generally known at the time) of an organic affection disturbing the action of the heart, at the early age of eighteen. And the peculiar interest of the case lies in the suppression, by this pious daughter (so far as it was possible), of her own bodily anguish, in order to beguile the mental anguish of her parents. The Latin epitaph is this :

“ Blanda anima, e cunis heu ! longo exercita morbo,
 Inter maternas heu lachrymasque patris,
 Quas risu lenire tuo jucunda solebas,
 Et levis, et proprii vix memor ipsa mali ;
 I, pete cælestes, ubi nulla est cura, recessus :
 Et tibi sit nullo mista dolore quies ! ”

The English version is this :

“ Doomed to long suffering from earliest years,
 Amidst your parents' grief and pain alone
 Cheerful and gay, you smiled to soothe their tears ;
 And in their agonies forgot your own.
 Go, gentle spirit ! and among the blest
 From grief and pain eternal be thy rest ! ”

In the Latin, the phrase e cunis hardly expresses from your cradle upwards. The second line is faulty in the opposition of maternas, an adjective, to the substantive patris ; whilst the repetition of the heu in two consecutive lines is ungraceful. In the fourth line, levis conveys a false meaning : levis must mean either physically light—i.e. not heavy—which is not the sense, or else tainted with levity, which is still less the sense. What Lord Wellesley wished to say was light-hearted : this he has not said ; but neither is it easy to say it in good Latin.

I complain, however, of the whole, as not bringing out Lord Wellesley's own feeling—which feeling is partly expressed in his verses, and partly in his accompanying prose note on Miss Brougham's mournful destiny (“ her life was a continual illness ”), contrasted with her fortitude, her innocent gaiety, and the pious motives under which she supported this gaiety to the last. Not as a direct version, but as filling up the outline of Lord Wellesley, sufficiently indicated by himself, I propose the following :—

INSCRIPTION FOR THE GRAVE OF THE HON. MARIA BROUGHAM . —

“ Child, that for thirteen<sup>1</sup> years hast fought with pain, Prompted by joy and depth of filial love,
 Rest now at God’s command. Oh ! not in vain
     His angel oft-times watched thee—oft, above
 All pangs that would have dimmed thy parents’ eyes, Saw thy young heart victoriously rise !
 Rise now for ever, self-forgetting child !
     Rise to those choirs where love like thine is blest,
 From pains of flesh, from filial tears assailed—
     Love which God’s hand shall crown with God’s own rest ! ”

---

<sup>1</sup> “ For thirteen ” :—i.e. from the age of five to eighteen, at which age she died.

COLERIDGE AND OPIUM-EATING<sup>1</sup>

WHAT is the deadeſt of things dead? It is, ſays the world, ever forward and raſh, “a door-nail.” But the world is wrong. There is a thing deader than a door-nail—viz Gillman’s Coleridge, Vol I<sup>2</sup> Dead, more dead, moſt dead, is Gillman’s Coleridge—dead, deader, deadeſt, is volume the firſt, which is waiting vainly, and for thouſands of years is doomed to wait, for its ſiſter volume, viz Vol. II. The man is not born whom prophetic deſtiny has appointed to the taſk of gilding thoſe ſhort-hand diſtinctions, Vol. II The readers of Vol. I. languish in vain for the ſecond courſe of their banquet; the caravan that ſhould convey it has foundered in the Arabian wilderneſs,

“And Mecca ſickens at the long delay.”

That Vol. I. is dead, through three degrees of comparison, appears certain to our mind, upon more arguments than one. The book has clearly not completed its elementary act of reſpiration; the ſyſtole of Vol. I. is abſolutely uſeſs and loſt without the diſtole of that Vol. II which is never to exiſt. That is one argument; and perhaps this ſecond argument is ſtronger. Gillman’s Coleridge, Vol. I, deals raſhly, unjuſtly, and almoſt maliciously, with ſome of our own particular friends ; and yet, until late in this summer, Anno Domini 1844, we—that is, ourselves and our friends—never heard of its existence. Now, a sloth, even without the benefit of Mr. Waterton's evidence to his character, will travel faster than that ; but malice, which travels fastest of all things, must be dead and cold at starting when it can thus have lingered in the rear for six years ; and therefore, though the world was so far right that people do say “ Dead as a door-nail,” yet henceforward the weakest of these people will see the propriety of saying “ Dead as Gillman's Coleridge.”

<sup>1</sup> Published originally in Blackwood for January 1845, as a review of “The Life of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. By James Gillman. Vol. I. London 1838”; and reprinted by De Quincey in 1859, with ſome changes, in the twelfth volume of his collected writings.—M.

<sup>2</sup> As De Quincey goes on to ſay, there never was a ſecond volume.
M.

The reader of experience, on sliding over the surface of this opening paragraph, begins to think there's mischief singing in the upper air. No, reader ; not at all. We never were cooler in our days. And this we protest : that, were it not for the excellence of the subject,—Coleridge and Opium-Eating,—Mr Gillman would have been dismissed by us unnoticed. Indeed, we not only forgive Mr. Gillman, but we have a special kindness for him ; and on this account,—that he was good, he was generous, he was most forbearing, through twenty years, to poor Coleridge, when thrown upon his hospitality. An excellent thing that, Mr. Gillman, and one sufficient, in our estimate, to blot out a world of libels on ourselves. But still, noticing the theme suggested by this unhappy Vol. I., we are forced at times to notice its author. Nor is this to be regretted. We remember a line of Horace never yet properly translated, viz.—

“ Nec scutica dignum horribili sectere flagello.”

The true translation of which, as we assure the unlearned reader, is, “ Nor him that is worthy of a simple rap on the knuckles, should you ‘fillip’ (as Jack Falstaff observes) “ with a three-man beetle”<sup>1</sup> Or, to give a literal version, “ Nor must you pursue with the horrid knout of Christopher that man who merits only a switching.” Very true. We protest against all attempts to invoke the exterminating knout or flagellum, for that sends a man to the hospital for two months ; but you see that the same judicious poet who dissuades an appeal to the knout indirectly recommends the switch—which, indeed, is rather pleasant than otherwise, amiably playful in some of its lighter caprices, and, in its very worst, suggesting only a pennyworth of diachylon.

<sup>1</sup> “ A three-man beetle ” :—A beetle is that heavy sort of pestle with which paviours drive home the paving-stones ; and sometimes, when it is too heavy for a single man, it is fitted up by three handles at right angles to the implement, for the use of three men.

We begin our review of this book by professing, with hearty sincerity, our fervent admiration of that extraordinary man who furnishes the theme for Mr. Gillman's coup d'essai in biography. He was, in a literary sense, our brother ; for he also was amongst the contributors to Blackwood, and will, we presume, take his station in that Blackwood gallery of portraits which in a century hence will possess more interest for intellectual Europe than any merely martial series of portraits, or any gallery of statesmen assembled in congress, except as regards one or two leaders ; for defunct major-generals and secondary diplomatists, when their date is past, awake no more emotion than last year's advertisements or obsolete directories ; whereas those who in a stormy age have swept the harps of passion, of genial wit, or of the wrestling and gladiatorial reason, become more interesting to men when they can no longer be seen as bodily agents than even in the middle chorus of that intellectual music over which, living, they presided.

Of this great camp Coleridge was a leader, and fought among the primipili ; yet comparatively he is still unknown. Heavy, indeed, are the arrears still due to philosophic curiosity on the real merits and on the separate merits of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Coleridge as a poet, Coleridge as a philosopher,—how extensive are those two questions, if those were all ! And upon neither question have we yet any investigation, such as, by compass of views, by research, or even by earnestness of sympathy with the subject, can or ought to satisfy a philosophic demand. Blind is that man who can persuade himself that the interest in Coleridge, taken as a total object, is becoming an obsolete interest. We are of opinion that even Milton, now viewed from a distance of two centuries, is still inadequately judged or appreciated in his character of poet, of patriot, and partisan, or, finally, in his character of accomplished scholar. But, if so, how much less can it be pretended that satisfaction has been rendered to the claims of Coleridge ! for upon Milton libraries have been written. There has been time for the malice of men, for the jealousy of men, for the enthusiasm, the scepticism, the adoring admiration of men to expand themselves. There has been room for a "slashing Bentley with his desperate hook," for an Addison, for a Johnson, for a wicked Lauder, for an avenging Douglas, for an idolising Chateaubriand, for a wild insulting infidel Curran<sup>1</sup> ; and yet, after all, little enough has been done towards any comprehensive estimate of the mighty being concerned. Piles of materials have been gathered to the ground, but, for the monument which should have risen from these materials, neither the first stone has been laid nor has a qualified architect yet presented his credentials. On the other hand, upon Coleridge little comparatively has yet been written ; whilst the separate characters on which the judgment is awaited are more by one than those which Milton sustained. Coleridge also is a poet Coleridge also was mixed up with the fervent politics of his age—an age how memorably reflecting the revolutionary agitations of Milton's age ! Coleridge also was an extensive and brilliant scholar. Whatever might be the separate proportions of the two men in each particular department of the three here noticed,—think as the reader will upon that point,—sure we are that either subject is ample enough to make a strain upon the amplest faculties. How alarming, therefore, for any honest critic who should undertake this later subject of Coleridge, to recollect that, after pursuing him through a zodiac of splendours corresponding to those of Milton in kind, however different in degree,—after weighing him as a poet, as a philosophic politician, as a scholar,—he will have to wheel after him into another orbit : unto the unfathomable nimbus of transcendental metaphysics ! Weigh him the critic must in the golden balance of philosophy the most abstruse—a balance which even itself requires weighing previously—or he will have done nothing that can be received for an estimate of the composite Coleridge. This astonishing man, be it again remembered, besides being an exquisite poet, a profound political speculator, a philosophic student of literature through all its chambers and recesses, was also a circumnavigator on the most pathless waters of scholasticism and metaphysics. He had sounded, without guiding-charts, the secret deeps of Proclus and Plotinus ; he had laid down buoys on the twilight or moonlight ocean of Jacob Boehmen<sup>1</sup>, he had cruised over the broad Atlantic of Kant and Schelling, of Fichte and Oken. Where is the man who shall be equal to these things ?

<sup>1</sup> The Rev. John Douglas, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, published his exposure of Lauder's forgeries in 1751. For "Curran" see Vol. IV. p. 105, n.—M.

We, at least, make no such adventurous effort ; or, if ever we should presume to do so, not at present. Here we design only to make a coasting voyage of survey round the headlands and most conspicuous seamarks of our subject, as they are brought forward by Mr. Gillman, or collaterally suggested by our own reflections ; and especially we wish to say a word or two on Coleridge as an opium-eater

Naturally the first point to which we direct our attention is the history and personal relations of Coleridge. Living with Mr. Gillman for nineteen years as a domesticated friend, Coleridge ought to have been known intimately. And it is reasonable to expect, from so much intercourse, some additions to our slender knowledge of Coleridge's adventures (if we may use so coarse a word), and of the secret springs at work in those early struggles of Coleridge,—at Cambridge, London, Bristol,—which have been rudely told to the world, and repeatedly told as showy romances, but never rationally explained.

The anecdotes, however, which Mr. Gillman has added to the personal history of Coleridge are as little advantageous to the effect of his own book as they are to the interest of the memorable character which he seeks to illustrate. Always they are told without grace, and generally are suspicious in their details. Mr Gillman we believe to be too upright a man for countenancing any untruth. He has been deceived <sup>1</sup> "Jacob Boehmen" —We ourselves had the honour of presenting to Mr. Coleridge Law's English version of Jacob—a set of huge quartos. Some months afterwards we saw this work lying open, and one volume, at least, overflowing, in parts, with the commentaries and the corollaries of Coleridge. Whither has this work, and so many others swathed about with Coleridge's manuscript notes, vanished from the world ?

For example, will any man believe this? A certain "excellent equestrian," falling in with Coleridge on horseback, thus accosted him: "Pray, sir, did you meet a tailor along the road?" "A tailor!" answered Coleridge "I did meet a person answering such a description, who told me he had dropped his goose; that, if I rode a little farther, I should find it. And I guess he must have meant you." In Joe Miller, this story would read perhaps sufferably. Joe has a privilege, and we do not look too narrowly into the mouth of a Joe Millerism; "a gift horse," as the old proverb instructs us, "must not have his mouth looked into"; but Mr. Gillman, writing the life of a philosopher, and no jest-book, is under a different law of decorum. That retort, however, which silences the jester some people may fancy must be a good one; and we are desired to believe that in this case the baffled assailant rode off in a spirit of benign candour, saying aloud to himself, like the excellent philosopher that he evidently was, "Caught a Tartar!"

But another story, of a sporting baronet, who was besides a member of Parliament, is much worse, and altogether degrading to Coleridge. This gentleman, by way of showing off before a party of ladies, is represented as insulting Coleridge by putting questions to him on the qualities of his horse,<sup>1</sup> so as to draw the animal's miserable defects into public notice, and then closing his display by demanding what he would take for the horse, "including the rider." The supposed reply of Coleridge might seem good to those who understand nothing of true dignity ; for, as an impromptu, it was smart, and even caustic. The baronet, it seems, was reputed to have been bought by the minister ; and the reader will at once divine that the retort took advantage of that current belief, so as to throw back the sarcasm, by proclaiming that neither horse nor rider had a price placarded in the market at which any man could become their purchaser. But this was not the temper in which Coleridge either did reply or could have replied. Coleridge showed, in the spirit of his manner, a profound sensibility to the nature of a gentleman ; and he felt too justly what it became a self-respecting person to say, ever to have aped the sort of flashy fencing which might seem fine to a theatrical blood.

<sup>1</sup> "His horse" —One fact, tolerably notorious, should have whispered to Mr. Gillman that all anecdotes which presuppose for their basis any equestrian skill or habits in Coleridge rest upon moonshine. Samuel Taylor Coleridge's first attempts at horsemanship were pretty nearly his last. What motive swayed the judgment, or what stormy impulse drove the passionate despair of Samuel Taylor Coleridge into quitting Jesus College, Cambridge, was never clearly or certainly made known to the very nearest of his friends. which lends further probability to a rumour, already in itself probable enough, that this motive which led, or this impulse which drove, the unhappy man into headlong acts of desperation, was—the reader will guess for himself, though ten miles distant—a woman. In fact, most of us play the fool at least once in our life-career; and the criminal cause of our doing so is pretty well ascertained by this time in all cases to be a woman Coleridge was hopelessly dismissed by his proud, disdainful goddess,

Another story is self-refuted. "A hired partisan" had come to one of Coleridge's political lectures with the express purpose of bringing the lecturer into trouble ; and most preposterously he laid himself open to his own snare by refusing to pay for admission. Spies must be poor artists who proceed thus Upon which Coleridge remarked "that, before the gentleman kicked up a dust, surely he would down with the dust." So far the story will not do. But what follows is possible enough The same "hired" gentleman, by way of giving unity to the tale, is described as having hissed. Upon this a cry arose of "Turn him out !" But Coleridge interfered to protect him. He insisted on the man's right to hiss if he thought fit ; it was legal to hiss ; it was natural to hiss :

although really she might have gone farther and fared worse. I am able, by female aid, to communicate a pretty close description of Samuel Taylor Coleridge as he was in the year 1796. In stature, according to the severe measurement taken down in the studio of a very distinguished artist, he was exactly 5 feet 10 inches in height ; with a blooming and healthy complexion ; beautiful and luxuriant hair, falling in natural curls over his shoulders , and, as a lady (the successor of Hannah More in her most lucrative boarding-school) said to me about the year of Waterloo, "simply the most perfect realisation of a pastoral Strephon that in all her life she had looked upon " Strephon was the romantic name that survived from her rosy days of sweet seventeen . at present, Strephon, as well as Chloe, are at a discount , but what she meant was an Adams. By reason of reading too much Kant and Schelling, he grew fat and corpulent towards Waterloo ; but he was then slender and agile as an antelope.

“For what is to be expected, gentlemen, when the cool waters of reason come in contact with red-hot aristocracy, but a hiss?” Euge!

Amongst all the anecdotes, however, of this splendid man—often trivial, often incoherent, often unauthenticated—there is one which strikes us as both true and interesting, and we are grateful to Mr. Gillman for preserving it. We find it introduced, and partially authenticated, by the following sentence from Coleridge himself:—“From eight to fourteen I was a playless day-dreamer, a helluo librorum, my appetite for which was indulged by a singular incident. A stranger, who was struck by my conversation, made me free of a circulating library in King Street, Cheapside.” The more circumstantial explanation of Mr. Gillman is this:—“The incident, indeed, was singular. Going down the Strand in one of his day-dreams, fancying himself swimming across the Hellespont, thrusting his hands before him as in the act of swimming, his hand came in contact with a gentleman’s pocket. The gentleman seized his hand: turning round and looking at him with some anger,—‘What! so young, and yet so wicked?’ at the same time accusing him of an attempt to pick his pocket. The frightened boy sobbed out his denial of the intention, and explained to him how he thought himself Leander swimming across the Hellespont. The gentleman was so struck and delighted with the novelty of the thing, and with the simplicity and intelligence of the boy, that he subscribed, as before stated, to the library; in consequence of which Coleridge was further enabled to indulge his love of reading.”

We fear that this slovenly narrative is the very perfection of bad story-telling. But the story itself is striking, and, by the very oddness of the incidents, not likely to have been invented. The effect, from the position of the two parties,—on the one side a simple child from Devonshire, dreaming in the Strand that he was swimming over from Sestos to Abydos; and, on the other, the experienced man, dreaming only of this world, its knaves and its thieves, but still kind and generous, and still capable of distinguishing,—is beautiful and picturesque. O, si sic omnia!

But the most interesting to us of the personalities connected with Coleridge are his feuds and his personal dislikes. Incomprehensible to us is the war of extermination which Coleridge made upon the political economists. Did Sir James Steuart in speaking of vine-dressers (not as vine-dressers, but generally as cultivators) tell his readers that, if such a man simply replaced his own consumption, leaving no surplus whatever or increment for the public capital, he could not be considered a useful citizen, not the beast in the Revelations is held up by Coleridge as more hateful to the spirit of truth than the Jacobite baronet. And yet we know of an author—viz. one S. T. Coleridge—who repeated the same doctrine without finding any evil in it. Look at the first part of Schiller's Wallenstein, where, Count Isolani having said "Poh! we are all his subjects,"—i.e. soldiers, though unproductive labourers, not less than productive peasants,—the emperor's envoy replies, "Yet with a difference, general", and the difference implies Sir James's scale,—his vine-dresser being the equatorial case between the two extremes of the envoy. Malthus again, in his Population book, contends for a mathematic difference between animal and vegetable life in respect to the law of increase; as though the first increased by geometrical ratios, the last by arithmetical! No proposition more worthy of laughter,—since both, when permitted to expand, increase by geometrical ratios, and the latter by much higher ratios; whereas Malthus persuaded himself of his crotchet simply by refusing the requisite condition in the vegetable case, and granting it in the other. If you take a few grains of wheat, and are required to plant all successive generations of their produce in the same flower-pot for ever, of course you neutralise its expansion by your own act of arbitrary limitation.<sup>1</sup> But so <sup>1</sup> Malthus would have rejoined by saying that the flower-pot limitation was the actual limitation of Nature in our present circumstances. In America it is otherwise, he would say, but England is the very flower-pot you suppose, she is a flower-pot which cannot be multiplied, and cannot even be enlarged. Very well, so be it (which we say in order to waive irrelevant disputes), but then the true inference will be, not that vegetable increase proceeds under a different law from that which governs animal increase, but that, through an accident of position, the experiment cannot be tried in England. Surely the levers of Archimedes, with submission to Sir Edward B.

you would do if you tried the case of animal increase by still exterminating all but one replacing couple of parents. This is not to try, but merely a pretence of trying, one order of powers against another. That was folly. But Coleridge combated this idea in a manner so obscure that nobody understood it. And, leaving these speculative conundrums, in coming to the great practical interests afloat in the poor laws, Coleridge did so little real work that he left as a res integra to Dr. Alison the capital argument that legal and adequate provision for the poor, whether impotent poor or poor accidentally out of work, does not extend pauperism: no; but is the one great resource for putting it down. Dr. Alison's overwhelming and experimental manifestations of that truth have prostrated Malthus and his generation for ever<sup>1</sup>. This comes of not attending to the Latin maxim, "Hoc age" (mind the object before you). Dr. Alison, a wise man, "hoc egit" (he minded the thing before him), Coleridge "abrud egit" (he hunted three hares at once). And we see the result. In a case which suited him, by interesting his peculiar feeling, Coleridge could command

"Attention full ten times as much as needs."

But search documents, value evidence, or thresh out bushels

Lytton, were not the less levers because he wanted the locum standi. It is proper, by the way, that we should inform the reader of this generation where to look for Coleridge's skirmishings with Malthus. They are to be found chiefly in the late Mr. William Hazlitt's work on that subject [Anonymous Reply in 1807 to Malthus on his Essay on Population]—a work which Coleridge so far claimed as to assert that it had been substantially made up from his own conversation.

<sup>1</sup> William Pulteney Alison, M.D., an elder brother of Sir Archibald Alison the historian, was Professor of the Institutes of Medicine in the University of Edinburgh from 1821 to 1842, and afterwards of the Practice of Physic in the same University from 1842 to 1855. He was a man eminent for philanthropy, and was conspicuous, as De Quincey notes, for his advocacy of a compulsory Poor Law system in opposition to the views of Malthus and others. De Quincey exaggerates, however, the influence of his advocacy of a Poor Law. Dr. Chalmers argued to the last against his contention for the compulsory Poor Law system, regarding the introduction of that system into Scotland in particular as a most woeful calamity, and many recent reasoners on the subject, Scottish and English, have been more in accord with Chalmers than with Alison.—M.

of statistical tables, Coleridge could not, any more than he could ride with Elliot's Dragoons.<sup>1</sup>

Another instance of Coleridge's inaptitude for such studies as political economy is found in his fancy, by no means "rich and rare," but meagre and trite, that taxes can never injure public prosperity by mere excess of quantity. If they injure, we are to conclude that it must be by their quality and mode of operation, or by their false appropriation (as, for instance, if they are sent out of the country and spent abroad); because, says Coleridge, if the taxes are exhaled from the country as vapours, back they come in drenching showers. Twenty pounds ascend in a Scotch mist to the Chancellor of the Exchequer from Leeds; but does it evaporate? Not at all. By return of post, down comes an order for twenty pounds' worth of Leeds cloth on account of government, seeing that the poor men of the —th regiment want new gaiters. And thus thinks S. T. Coleridge. True; but, of this return twenty pounds, not more than four will be profit—v. e. surplus accruing to the public capital; whereas of the original twenty pounds every shilling was surplus. The same unsound fancy has been many times brought forward, often in England, often in France; but it is curious that its first appearance upon any stage was precisely two centuries ago, when as yet political economy slept with the pre-Adamites—viz. in the Long Parliament. In a quarto volume of the debates during 1644, printed as an independent work, will be found the same identical doctrine, supported very sonorously by the same little love of an illustration from the see-saw of mist and rain.

Political economy was not Coleridge's forte. In politics he was happier. In mere personal politics he (like every man when reviewed from a station distant by forty years) will often appear to have erred; nay, he will be detected and nailed in error. But this is the necessity of us all. Keen are the refutations of time; and absolute results to posterity are the fatal touchstone of opinions in the past. It is undeniable, besides, that Coleridge had strong personal antipathies,—for instance, to Messrs. Pitt and Dundas. Yet

<sup>1</sup> The name of the regiment in which Coleridge had served for some months in 1793-4 —M.

why, we never could understand. We once heard him tell a story upon Windermere to the late Mr. Curwen, then M.P. for Workington, which was meant apparently to account for this feeling. The story amounted to this: that, when a freshman at Cambridge, Mr. Pitt had wantonly amused himself at a dinner party in smashing with filberts (discharged in showers like grape shot) a most costly dessert set of cut glass; from which Samuel Taylor Coleridge inferred a principle of destructiveness in his cerebellum,—which, if so, was a palliation, and no aggravation. Now, if this dessert set belonged to some poor suffering Trinitarian, and not to himself, we are of opinion that he was faulty, and ought, upon his own great subsequent maxim, to have been coerced into “indemnity for the past and security for the future.” But, besides that this glassy mythus belongs to an era fifteen years earlier than Coleridge’s, so as to justify a shadow of scepticism, we really cannot find in such an escapade under the boiling blood of youth any sufficient justification of that withering malignity towards the name of Pitt which runs through Coleridge’s famous Fire, Famine, and Slaughter. As this little viperous jeu d’esprit (published anonymously<sup>1</sup>) subsequently became the subject of a celebrated after-dinner discussion in London at which Coleridge (comme de raison) was the chief speaker, the reader of this generation may wish to know the question at issue; and, in order to judge of that, he must know the outline of the devil’s squib. The writer brings upon the scene three pleasant young ladies—viz Miss Fire, Miss Famine, and Miss Slaughter. “What are you up to? What’s the row?” we may suppose to be the introductory question of the poet. And the answer of the ladies makes us aware that they are fresh from larking in Ireland and France. A glorious spree they had; lots of fun, and laughter à discretion.<sup>2</sup> At all times gratus puellæ risus ab angulo; so that we listen to their little gossip with interest. They had been setting men, it seems, by the ears, and the drollest little atrocities they do certainly report. Not but we have seen better in the Nenagh paper, so far as Ireland is concerned, but the pet little joke was in La Vendée. Miss Famine, who is the girl for our money, raises the question whether any of them can tell the name of the leader and prompter to these high jinks of hell; if so, let her whisper it.

<sup>1</sup> In 1798 —M.

<sup>2</sup> The laughter of girls is, and ever was, among the delightful sounds of earth. Girls do not excel in philosophy: we have ascertained that this is not their forte

“Whisper it, sister, so and so,
In a dark hunt, distinct and low.”

Upon which the playful Miss Slaughter replies,—

“Letters four do form his name
* * * * *

He came by stealth and unlocked my den;
And I have drunk the blood since then
Of thrice three hundred thousand men.”

Good; but the sting of the hornet lies in the conclusion. If this quadrilateral man had done so much for them (though, really, we think 6s. 8d, which is an attorney's fee, might have settled his claim), what, says Fire, setting her arms akimbo, would they do for him? Slaughter replies, rather crustily, that, as far as a good kicking would go, or (says Famine) a little matter of tearing to pieces by the mob, they would be glad to take tickets at his benefit. “How, you bitches!” says Fire. “Is that all?”

‘I alone am faithful; I Clung to him everlastingly.’”

The sentiment is diabolical; and the question argued at the London dinner-table was, Could the writer have been other than a devil? The dinner was at the late excellent Mr. Sotheby's, known advantageously in those days as the translator of Wieland's Oberon. Several of the great guns amongst the literary body were present—in particular, Sir Walter Scott; and he, we believe, with his usual good nature, took the apologetic side of the dispute, in fact, he was in the secret. Nobody else, barring the author, knew at first whose good name was at stake. The scene must have been high. The company kicked about the poor diabolic writer's head as if it had been a tennis-ball. Coleridge, the yet unknown criminal, but still as an unknown sinner, absolutely perspired and fumed in pleading for the defendant; the company demurred ; the orator grew urgent ; wits began to smoke the case, as active verbs—the advocate to smoke, as a neuter verb ; the “fun grew fast and furious” ; until at length delinquent arose, burning tears in his eyes, and confessed to an audience, now bursting with stifled laughter (but whom he supposed to be bursting with fiery indignation), “Lo, I am he that wrote it !”

For our own part we side with Coleridge. Malice is not always of the heart ; there is a malice of the understanding and the fancy. Neither do we think the worse of a man for having invented the most horrible and old-woman-troubling curse that demons ever listened to. We are too apt to swear horribly ourselves ; and often have we frightened the cat—to say nothing of the kettle—by our shocking (far too shocking) oaths.

There were other celebrated men whom Coleridge detested, or seemed to detest—Paley, Sir Sidney Smith, Lord Hutchinson, and Cuvier. To Paley it might seem as if his antipathy had been purely philosophic ; but we believe that partly it was personal ; and it tallies with this belief that, in his earliest political tracts, Coleridge charged the archdeacon repeatedly with his own joke, as if it had been a serious saying—viz. “that he could not afford to keep a conscience” ; such luxuries, like a carriage, for instance, being obviously beyond the finances of poor men.

With respect to the philosophic question between the parties as to the grounds of moral election, we hope it is no treason to suggest that both were perhaps in error. Against Paley it occurs at once that he himself would not have made consequences the practical test in valuing the morality of an act, since these can very seldom be traced at all up to the final stages, and in the earliest stages are exceedingly different under different circumstances ; so that the same act, tried by its consequences, would bear a fluctuating appreciation. This could not have been Paley’s revised meaning ; consequently, had he been pressed by opposition, it would have come out that by test he meant only speculative test—a very harmless doctrine, certainly, but useless and impertinent to any purpose of his system. The reader may catch our meaning in the following illustration. It is a matter of general belief that happiness, upon the whole, follows in a higher degree from constant integrity than from the closest attention to self-interest. Now, happiness is one of those consequences which Paley meant by final or remotest, but we could never use this idea as an exponent of integrity or interchangeable criterion; because happiness cannot be ascertained or appreciated except upon long tracts of time, whereas the particular act of integrity depends continually upon the election of the moment. No man, therefore, could venture to lay down as a rule, Do what makes you happy; use this as your test of actions, satisfied that in that case always you will do the thing which is right; for he cannot discern independently what will make him happy, and he must decide on the spot. The use of the nexus between morality and happiness must therefore be inverted; it is not practical or prospective, but simply retrospective; and in that form it says no more than the good old rules hallowed in every cottage. But this furnishes no practical guide for moral election which a man had not before he ever thought of this nexus. In the sense in which it is true, we need not go to the professor's chair for this maxim; in the sense in which it would serve Paley, it is absolutely false.

On the other hand, as against Coleridge, it is certain that many acts could be mentioned which are judged to be good or bad only because their consequences are known to be so, whilst the great catholic acts of life are entirely (and, if we may so phrase it, haughtily) independent of consequences. For instance, fidelity to a trust is a law of immutable morality subject to no casuistry whatever. You have been left executor to a friend; you are to pay over his last legacy to X, though a dissolute scoundrel; and you are to give no shilling of it to the poor brother of X, though a good man and a wise man, struggling with adversity. You are absolutely excluded from all contemplation of results. It was your deceased friend's right to make the will; it is yours simply to see it executed. Now, in opposition to this primary class of actions stands another, such as the habit of intoxication, which is known to be wrong only by observing the consequences. If drunkenness did not terminate, after some years, in producing bodily weakness, irritability in the temper, and so forth, it would not be a vicious act ; and accordingly, if a transcendent motive should arise in favour of drunkenness, as that it would enable you to face a degree of cold or contagion else menacing to life, a duty would arise, pro hac vice, of getting drunk. We had an amiable friend who suffered under the infirmity of cowardice, an awful coward he was when sober, but when very drunk, he had courage enough for the Seven Champions of Christendom. Therefore, in an emergency, where he knew himself suddenly loaded with the responsibility of defending a family, we approved highly of his getting drunk. But to violate a trust could never become right under any change of circumstances. Coleridge, however, altogether overlooked this distinction, which, on the other hand, stirring in Paley's mind, but never brought out to distinct consciousness, nor ever investigated nor limited, has undermined his system. Perhaps it is not very important how a man theorises upon morality. Happily for us all, God has left no man in such questions practically to the guidance of his understanding ; but still, considering that academic bodies are partly instituted for the support of speculative truth as well as truth practical, we must think it a blot upon the splendour of Oxford and Cambridge that both of them, in a Christian land, make Paley the foundation of their ethics, the alternative being Aristotle. And in our mind, though far inferior as a moralist to the Stoics, Aristotle is often less of a pagan than Paley.

Coleridge's dislike to Sir Sidney Smith and the Egyptian Lord Hutchinson fell under the category of Martial's case :—

“ Non amo te, Sabidi, nec possum dicere quare ;
Hoc solum novi—non amo te, Sabidi.”

Against Lord Hutchinson we never heard him plead anything of moment except that he was finically Frenchified in his diction ; of which he gave this instance : that, having occasion to notice a brick wall (which was literally that, not more and not less), when reconnoitring the French defences, he called it a revêtement. And we ourselves remember his using the French word gloriole rather ostentatiously—that is, when no particular emphasis attached to the case. But every man has his foibles, and few, perhaps, are less conspicuously annoying than this of Lord Hutchinson. Sir Sidney's crimes were less distinctly revealed to our mind. As to Cuvier, Coleridge's hatred of him was more to our taste; for (though quite unreasonable, we fear) it took the shape of patriotism. He insisted on it that our British John Hunter was the genuine article, and that Cuvier was a humbug. Now, speaking privately to the public, we cannot go quite so far as that, but, when publicly we address that most respectable character, en grand costume, we always mean to back Coleridge, for we are a horrible John Bull ourselves. As Joseph Hume observes, it makes no difference to us—right or wrong, black or white—when our countrymen are concerned; and John Hunter, notwithstanding he had a bee in his bonnet,<sup>1</sup> was really a great man, though it will not follow that Cuvier must therefore have been a little one. We do not pretend to be acquainted with the tenth part of Cuvier's performances, but we suspect that Coleridge's range in that respect was not much greater than our own.

Other cases of monomaniac antipathy we might revive from our recollections of Coleridge had we a sufficient motive; but, in compensation, and by way of redressing the balance, he had many strange likings,—equally monomaniac,—and, unaccountably, he chose to exhibit his whimsical partialities by dressing up, as it were, in his own clothes, such a set of scarecrows as eye has not beheld. Heavens! what an ark of unclean beasts would have been Coleridge's private menagerie of departed philosophers, could they all have been trotted out in succession! But did the reader feel them to be the awful bores which, in fact, they were? No; because Coleridge had blown upon these withered anatomies, through the blow-pipe of his own creative genius, a stream of gas that swelled the tissue of their antediluvian wrinkles, forced colour upon their cheeks and splendour upon their sodden eyes. Such a process of ventriloquism never has existed. He spoke by their organs; they were the tubes; and he forced through their wooden machinery his own Beethoven harmonies.

<sup>1</sup> Vide, in particular, for the most exquisite specimen of pig-headedness that the world can furnish, his perverse evidence on the once famous case at the Warwick assizes, of Captain Donellan for poisoning his brother-in-law, Sir Theodosius Boughton. [The case occurred in 1781.—M.]

First came Dr. Andrew Bell<sup>1</sup> We knew him. Was he dull? Is a wooden spoon dull! Fishy were his eyes; torpedinous was his manner, and his main idea, out of two which he really had, related to the moon—from which you infer, perhaps, that he was lunatic. By no means. It was no craze, under the influence of the moon, which possessed him, it was an idea of mere hostility to the moon. In Madras had Dr. Andrew lived. The Madras people, like many others, had an idea that she influenced the weather. Subsequently the Herschels, senior and junior, systematised this idea; and then the wrath of Andrew, previously in a crescent state, actually dilated to a penilunar orb. The Westmoreland people (for at the Lakes it was we knew him) expounded his condition to us by saying that he was “maffled”; which word means “perplexed in the extreme.” His wrath did not pass into lunacy; it produced simple distraction, an uneasy fumbling with the idea—like that of an old superannuated dog who longs to worry, but cannot for want of teeth. In this condition you will judge that he was rather tedious; and in this condition Coleridge took him up Andrew’s other idea, because he had two, related to education. Perhaps six-sevenths of that also came from Madras. No matter; Coleridge took that up; Southey also; but Southey with his usual temperate fervour. Coleridge, on the other hand, found celestial marvels both in the scheme and in the man. Then commenced the apotheosis of Andrew Bell; and, because it happened that his opponent, Lancaster,<sup>2</sup> between ourselves, really had stolen his ideas from Bell, what between the sad wickedness of Lancaster and the celestial transfiguration of Bell, gradually Coleridge heated himself to such an extent that people, when referring to that subject, asked each other, “Have you heard Coleridge lecture on Bell and the Dragon?”

The next man glorified by Coleridge was John Woolman, the Quaker.<sup>3</sup> Him, though we once possessed his works, it cannot be truly affirmed that we ever read. Try to read John we often did, but read John we did not. Thus, however, you say, might be our fault, and not John's. Very likely; and we have a notion that now, with our wiser thoughts, we should read John if he were here on this table. It is certain that he was a good man, and one of the earliest in America, if not in Christendom, who lifted up his hand to protest against the slave trade, but still we suspect that, had John been all that Coleridge represented, he would not have repelled us from reading his travels in the fearful way that he did. But again we beg pardon, and entreat the earth of Virginia to lie light upon the remains of John Woolman, for he was an Israelite indeed, in whom there was no guile.

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Andrew Bell, 1753-1832.—M.

<sup>2</sup> Joseph Lancaster, 1771-1838 —M.

<sup>3</sup> John Woolman, 1720-1772 —M.

The third person raised to divine honours by Coleridge was Bowyer, the master of Christ's Hospital, London—a man whose name rises into the nostrils of all who knew him with the gracious odour of a tallow chandler's melting house upon melting day, and whose memory is embalmed in the hearty detestation of all his pupils. Coleridge describes this man as a profound critic. Our idea of him is different. We are of opinion that Bowyer was the greatest villain of the eighteenth century. We may be wrong; but we cannot be far wrong. Talk of knouting indeed! which we did at the beginning of this paper in the mere playfulness of our hearts,—and which the great master of the knout, Christopher, who visited men's trespasses like the Eumenides, never resorted to but in love for some great idea which had been outraged,—why, this man knouted his way through life, from bloody youth up to truculent old age. Grim idol! whose altars reeked with children's blood, and whose dreadful eyes never smiled except as the stern goddess of the Thugs smiles when the sound of human lamentations inhabits her ears. So much had the monster fed upon this great idea of "flogging," and transmuted it into the very nutriment of his heart, that he seems to have conceived the gigantic project of flogging all mankind; nay, worse; for Mr. Gillman, on Coleridge's authority, tells us (p. 24) the following anecdote.—" 'Surrah, 'I'll flog you,' were words so familiar to him, that on one " occasion, some female friend of one of the boys" [who had come on an errand of intercession] " still lingering & the “ door, after having been abruptly told to go, Bowyer exclaimed, ‘ Bring that woman here, and I’ll flog her.’ ”

To this horrid incarnation of whips and scourges Coleridge, in his Biographia Literaria, ascribes ideas upon criticism and taste which every man will recognise at once as the intense peculiarities of Coleridge. Could these notions really have belonged to Bowyer, then how do we know but he wrote the Ancient Mariner? Yet, on consideration, no; for even Coleridge admitted that, spite of his fine theorising upon composition, Mr Bowyer did not prosper in the practice—of which he gave us this illustration, and, as it is supposed to be the one only specimen of the Bowyeriana which now survives in this sublunary world, we are glad to extend its glory. It is the most curious example extant of the melodious in sound:—

“ ’Twas thou that smooth’d’st the rough-rugg’d bed of pain ”

“ Smooth’d’st ! ” Would the teeth of a crocodile not splinter under that word? It seems to us as if Mr Bowyer’s verses ought to be boiled before they can be read. And, when he says, ’Twas thou, who or what is the wretch talking to? Can he be apostrophising the knout? We very much fear it. If so, then you see (reader) that, even when incapacitated by illness from operating, he still adores the usage of his holy scourge, and invokes it as alone able to smooth “ his rough-rugg’d bed ” O thou infernal Bowyer! upon whom even Trollope (History of Christ’s Hospital) charges “ a discipline tinctured with more than due severity,” can there be any partners found for thee in a quadrille except Draco the bloody lawgiver, Bishop Bonner, and Mrs Brownrigg?<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Draco and the Bishop belong to History,—the first as bloody lawgiver in the days of the elder Athens, the Bishop as fiery disciplinarian to weak, relapsing perverts (such is the modern slang): sneaking perverts like myself and my ever-honoured reader, who would be very willing to give the Bishop a kick in the dark, but would find ourselves too much of cowards to stand to it when the candles were brought. These men are well known; but who is Mrs. Brownrigg? The reader would not have asked had he lived in the days of the Anti-Jacobin, who describes Mrs. Brownrigg as the woman “ who whipped two female ’prentices to death,

And hid them in the coal-hole.”

The next pet was Sir Alexander Ball.<sup>1</sup> Concerning Bowyer, Coleridge did not talk much, but chiefly wrote, concerning Bell, he did not write much, but chiefly talked, concerning Ball, however, he both wrote and talked. It was in vain to muse upon any plan for having Ball black-balled, or for rebelling against Bell. Think of a man who had fallen into one pit called Bell secondly falling into another pit called Ball. This was too much. We were obliged to quote poetry against them.

“ Letters four do form his name.
He came by stealth and unlocked my den :
And the nightmare I have felt since then
Of thine three hundred thousand men.”

Not that we insinuate any disrespect to Sir Alexander Ball. He was about the foremost, we believe, in all good qualities, amongst Nelson's admirable captains at the Nile. He commanded a seventy-four most effectually in that battle, he governed Malta as well as Sancho (see Don Quixote) governed Barataria; and he was a true practical philosopher,—as, indeed, was Sancho. But still, by all that we could ever learn, Sir Alexander had no taste for the abstract upon any subject, and would have read as mere delirious wanderings those philosophic opinions which Coleridge fastened like wings upon his respectable but astounded shoulders.

We really beg pardon for having laughed a little at these crazes of Coleridge, but laugh we did, of mere necessity, in those days, at Bell and Ball,<sup>2</sup> whenever we did not groan. And, as the same precise alternative offers itself now,—viz. that in recalling the case we must reverberate either the groaning or the laughter,—we presume the reader would vote for the last. Coleridge, we are well convinced, owed all these wandering and exaggerated estimates of men—these diseased impulses, that, like the mirage, showed lakes and fountains where in reality there were only arid deserts—to the derangements worked by opium. But now, for the sake of change, let us pass to another topic. Suppose we say a word or two on Coleridge's accomplishments as a scholar. We are not going to enter on so large a field as that of his scholarship in connexion with his philosophic labours—scholarship in the result, not this, but scholarship in the means and machinery, range of verbal scholarship, is what we propose for a moment's review.

<sup>1</sup> Rear-Admiral Sir Alexander Ball, Governor of Malta from 1801 to 1809—M.

<sup>2</sup> “Bell and Ball”:—i.e. not to cause any misunderstanding, I mean, Bell and Ball, Ball and Bell, in order to impress the wearisome iteration.

For instance, what sort of a German scholar was Coleridge? We dare say that, because in his version of the Wallenstein there are some inaccuracies, those who may have noticed them will hold him cheap in this particular pretension. But to a certain degree they will be wrong. Coleridge was not very accurate in anything but in the use of logic. All his philological attainments were imperfect. He did not talk German; or so obscurely,—and, if he attempted to speak fast, so erroneously,—that in his second sentence, when conversing with a German lady of rank, he contrived to assure her that in his humble opinion she was a ——. Hard it is to fill up the hiatus decorously; but in fact the word very coarsely expressed that she was no better than she should be. Which reminds us of a parallel misadventure to a German, whose English education had been equally neglected. Having obtained an interview with an English lady, who, having recently lost her husband, must (as he in his unwashed German condition took for granted) be open to new offers, he opened his business thus.—“Highborn madam, since your husband have kicked de bucket——” “Sir!” interrupted the lady, astonished and displeased. “Oh, pardon!—nine, ten thousand pardon! Now I make new beginning—quite oder beginning. Madam, since your husband have cut his stick——” It may be supposed that this did not mend matters; and, reading so much in the lady's countenance, the German drew out an octavo dictionary, and said, perspiring with shame at having a second time missed fire, “Madam, since your husband have gone to kingdom come——” This he said beseechingly; but the lady was past propitiation by this time, and rapidly moved towards the door. Things had now reached a crisis; and, if something were not done quickly, the game was up. Now, therefore, taking a last hurried look at his dictionary, the German flew after the lady, crying out, in a voice of despair, "Madam, since your husband—your most respected husband—your never-enough-to-be-worshipped husband—have hopped de twig—" <sup>1</sup> This was his sheet anchor; and, as this also came home, of course the poor man was totally wrecked. It turned out that the dictionary he had used—(Arnold's, we think), a work of one hundred and fifty years back, and, from mere German ignorance, giving slang translations from Tom Brown, L'Estrange, and other jocular writers—had put down the verb sterben (to die) with the following worshipful series of equivalents.—1. To kick the bucket, 2 To cut one's stick; 3 To go to kingdom come; 4. To hop the twig; 5. To drop off the perch into Davy's locker.

But, though Coleridge did not pretend to any fluent command of conversational German, he read it with great ease. His knowledge of German literature was, indeed, too much limited by his rare opportunities for commanding anything like a well-mounted library; and particularly it surprised us that Coleridge knew little or nothing of John Paul Richter. But his acquaintance with the German philosophic masters was extensive; and his valuation of many individual German words or phrases was delicate, and sometimes profound.

As a Grecian, Coleridge must be estimated with a reference to the state and standard of Greek literature at that time and in this country. Porson had not yet raised our ideal, i.e. had not yet told upon that ideal. The earliest laurels of Coleridge were gathered, however, in that field. Yet no man will at this day pretend that the Greek of his prize ode <sup>is</sup> sufferable. Neither did Coleridge ever become an accurate Grecian in later times, when better models of scholarship and better aids to scholarship had begun to multiply. But still we must assert this point of superiority for Coleridge, that, whilst he never was what may be called a well-mounted nor a well-grounded scholar in any department of verbal scholarship, he yet displayed sometimes a brilliancy of conjectural sagacity and a felicity of philosophic investigation, even in this path, such as better scholars do not often attain, and of a kind which cannot be learned from books. But, as respects his accuracy, again we must recall to the reader the state of Greek literature in England during Coleridge's youth; and in all equity, as a means of placing Coleridge in the balances, specifically we must recall the state of Greek metrical composition at that period.

<sup>1</sup> Ist eben jetzt gestorben was his German idea, which he thus rendered in classical English.

To measure the condition of Greek literature, even in Cambridge, about the initial period of Coleridge, we need only look back to the several translations of Gray's Elegy by three (if not four) of the reverend gentlemen at that time attached to Eton College. Mathias, no very great scholar himself in this particular field, made himself merry, in his Pursuits of Literature, with these Eton translations. In that he was right. But he was not right in praising a contemporary translation by Cook, who (we believe) was the immediate predecessor of Porson in the Greek chair. As a specimen of this translation,<sup>1</sup> we cite one stanza; and we cannot be supposed to select unfairly, because it is the stanza which Mathias—confessedly the proneur of Cook's version—praises in extravagant terms. "Here," says he, "Gray, Cook, and Nature do seem to contend for the mastery." The English quatrain must be familiar to everybody.—

"The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth, e'er gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour.
The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

And the following, we believe, though quoting from a thirty-three years' recollection<sup>2</sup> of it, is the exact Greek version of Cook:—

'Α χάρις εὐγενέων, χάρις ἂ βασιλίδος ἀρχῆς, Δῶρα τύχης χρυσέης<sup>3</sup> Ἀφροδίτης κατὰ τὰ δῶρα, Πάνθ' ἅμα ταῦτα τέθνηκε, καὶ εἶδεν μόρσιμον ἄμαρ.
'Ηρώων κλέ' ὄλωλε, καὶ ᾗχετο ξυὸν ἐς Ἄδην.

<sup>1</sup> It was printed at the end of Aristotle's Poetics, which Dr. Cook edited.

<sup>2</sup> A thirty-three years' recollection in 1844; but now, within sixty hours of the Calendæ Apriles (viz. All Fool's Festival), fourteen or fifteen years more.

<sup>3</sup> χρυσέης:—It is remarkable that this epithet has been everywhere assigned to τύχης. Δῶρα τύχης, the gifts of Fortune, which in this

Now, really, these verses, by force of a little mosaic tessellation from genuine Greek sources, pass fluently over the tongue, but can they be considered other than a cento? Swarms of English schoolboys at this day would not feel very proud to adopt them. In fact, we remember (at a period say twelve years later than this) some iambic verses, which were really composed by a boy—viz. a son of Dr Prettyman (afterwards Tomline), Bishop of Winchester, and, in earlier times, private tutor to Mr. Pitt. They were published by Middleton, first Bishop of Calcutta, in the preface to his work on the Greek article; and, for racy idiomatic Greek, self-originated, and not a mere mocking-bird's iteration of alien notes, are so much superior to all the attempts of these sexagenarian doctors as distinctly to mark the growth of a new era and a new generation in this difficult accomplishment within the first decennium of this century. It is singular that only one blemish is suggested by any of the contemporary critics in Dr Cook's verses—viz. in the word ξυρόν, for which this critic proposes to substitute κοινόν, to prevent, as he observes, the last syllable of ᾤχετο from being lengthened by the ξ. Such considerations as these are necessary to the trutina castigatio (the trimming of the balance) before we can appraise Coleridge's place on the scale of his own day; which day, quoad hoc, be it remembered, i.e. in reference to this particular accomplishment, was 1790.

As to French, Coleridge read it with too little freedom to find pleasure in French literature. Accordingly, we never recollect his referring for any purpose, either of argument or place is meant to indicate riches, corresponding to Gray's All that Wealth e'er gave, might seem at first sight to justify this allocation of the epithet golden. But, on this way of understanding the appropriation, we are met by a prosaic and purely mechanic fact—the gifts of golden Fortune, as the giver of golden coins—Persian daries or English guineas. Meantime this epithet has an old traditional consecration to Venus, and in such an application springs upward like a pyramid of fire into a far more illimitable and unagulative value. A truth which Shakspeare caught at once by a subtle divination of his own unfathomable sensibility. Accordingly, without needing any Grecian guidance or model, how profound is the effect of that line—

“What is't that takes from thee thy golden sleep?”

illustration, to a French classic. Latin, from his regular scholastic training, naturally he read with a scholar's fluency, and indeed he read constantly in authors such as Petrarch, Erasmus, Calvin, &c., whose prose works he could not then have found in translations. But Coleridge had not cultivated an acquaintance with the delicacies of classic Latinity. And it is remarkable that Wordsworth, educated most negligently at Hawkshead school, subsequently, by reading the lyric poetry of Horace, simply for his own delight as a student of composition, made himself a master of Latinity in its most difficult form; whilst Coleridge, trained regularly in a great southern school, never carried his Latin to any point of classical polish.

There is another accomplishment of Coleridge's, less broadly open to the judgment of this generation, and not at all of the next—viz his splendid art of conversation,—on which it will be interesting to say a word. Ten years ago, when the music of this rare performance had not yet ceased to vibrate in men's ears, what a sensation was gathering amongst the educated classes on this particular subject! What a tumult of anxiety prevailed to "hear Mr. Coleridge," or even to talk with a man who had heard him. Had he lived till this day, not Paganini would have been so much sought after. That sensation is now decaying, because a new generation has emerged during the ten years since his death. But many still remain whose sympathy (whether of curiosity in those who did not know him or of admiration in those who did) still reflects as in a mirror the great stir upon this subject which then was moving in the world. To these, if they should inquire for the great distinguishing principle of Coleridge's conversation, we might say that it was the power of vast combination. He gathered into focal concentration the largest body of objects, apparently disconnected, that any man ever yet, by any magic, could assemble, or, having assembled, could manage. His great fault was that, by not opening sufficient spaces for reply, or suggestion, or collateral notice, he not only narrowed his own field, but he grievously injured the final impression. For, when men's minds are purely passive, when they are not allowed to react, then it is that they collapse most, and that their sense of what is said must ever be feeblest. Doubtless there must have been great conversational masters elsewhere, and at many periods; but in this lay Coleridge's characteristic advantage, that he was a great natural power, and also a great artist. He was a power in the art; and he carried a new art into the power.

But now, finally,—having left ourselves little room for more,—one or two words on Coleridge as an opium-eater.

We have not often read a sentence falling from a wise man with astonishment so profound as that particular one in a letter of Coleridge's to Mr. Gillman which speaks of the effort to wean one's self from opium as a trivial task. There are, we believe, several such passages; but we refer to that one in particular, which assumes that a single "week" will suffice for the whole process of so mighty a revolution. Is, indeed, leviathan so tamed? In that case, the quarantine of the opium-eater might be finished within Coleridge's time and with Coleridge's romantic ease. But mark the contradictions of this extraordinary man. Not long ago we were domesticated with a venerable rustic, strongheaded, but incurably obstinate in his prejudices, who treated the whole body of medical men as ignorant pretenders, knowing absolutely nothing of the system which they professed to superintend. This, you will remark, is no very singular case. No; nor, as we believe, is the antagonist case of ascribing to such men magical powers. Nor, what is worse still, the co-existence of both cases in the same mind, as in fact happened here; for this same obstinate friend of ours, who treated all medical pretensions as the mere jest of the universe, every third day was exacting from his own medical attendants some exquisite tour de force, as that they should know or should do something, which if they had known or done, all men would have suspected them reasonably of magic. He rated the whole medical body as infants; and yet what he exacted from them every third day, as a matter of course, virtually presumed them to be the only giants within the whole range of science. Parallel and equal is the contradiction of Coleridge. He speaks of opium excess—his own excess we mean—the excess of twenty-five years—as a thing to be laid aside easily and for ever within seven days ; and yet, on the other hand, he describes it pathetically, sometimes with a frantic pathos, as the scourge, the curse, the one almighty blight which had desolated his life

This shocking contradiction we need not press. All readers will see that. But some will ask, Was Mr. Coleridge right in either view ? Being so atrociously wrong in the first notion (viz. that the opium of twenty-five years was a thing easily to be forsworn), where a child could know that he was wrong, was he even altogether right, secondly, in believing that his own life, root and branch, had been withered by opium ? For it will not follow, because, with a relation to happiness and tranquillity, a man may have found opium his curse, that therefore, as a creature of energies and great purposes, he must have been the wreck which he seems to suppose. Opium gives and takes away. It defeats the steady habit of exertion ; but it creates spasms of irregular exertion. It runs the natural power of life ; but it develops preternatural paroxysms of intermitting power.

Let us ask of any man who holds that not Coleridge himself, but the world, as interested in Coleridge's usefulness, has suffered by his addiction to opium, whether he is aware of the way in which opium affected Coleridge ; and, secondly, whether he is aware of the actual contributions to literature—how large they were—which Coleridge made in spite of opium. All who were intimate with Coleridge must remember the fits of genial animation which were created continually in his manner and in his buoyancy of thought by a recent or by an extra dose of the omnipotent drug. A lady, who knew nothing experimentally of opium, once startled us by saying that she “could tell to a certainty when Mr. Coleridge had taken too much opium by his shining countenance.” She was right, and we knew it ; but thought the secret within narrow keeping. We knew that mark of opium excesses well, and the cause of it, or at least we believe the cause to lie in the quickening of the insensible perspiration which accumulates and glistens on the face. Be that as it may, a criterion it was that could not deceive us as to the condition of Coleridge. And uniformly in that condition he made his most effective intellectual displays. It is true that he might not be happy under this fiery animation; and we fully believe that he was not. Nobody is happy, except for a very short term of years, under an artificial stimulation. But in what way did that operate upon his exertions as a writer? We are of opinion that it killed Coleridge as a poet. "The harp of Quantock"<sup>1</sup> was silenced for ever by the torment of opium, but proportionably it roused and stung by misery his metaphysical instincts into more spasmodic life. Poetry can flourish only in the atmosphere of happiness. But subtle and perplexed investigations of difficult problems are amongst the commonest resources for beguiling the sense of misery. And for this we have the direct authority of Coleridge himself, speculating on his own case. In the beautiful though unequal ode entitled Dejection, stanza sixth, occurs the following passage:—

"For not to think of what I needs must feel,
But to be still and patient all I can,
And haply by abstuse research to steal
From my own nature all the natural man,—
This was my sole resource, my only plan;
Till that which suits a part infects the whole,
And now is almost grown the habit of my soul."

Considering the exquisite quality of some poems which Coleridge has composed, nobody can grieve (or has grieved) more than ourselves at seeing so beautiful a fountain choked up with weeds. But, had Coleridge been a happier man, it is our fixed belief that we should have had far less of his philosophy, and perhaps not much more of his general literature. In the estimate of the public, doubtless, that will seem a good exchange. Every man to his taste. Meantime, what we wish to show is that the loss was not absolute, but merely relative.

It is urged, however, that, even on his philosophic specu-

<sup>1</sup> "The Harp of Quantock" —Under that designation it was that Wordsworth had apostrophised Coleridge as a poet after long years of silence. The Quantock Hills, in southern Somersetshire, are alluded to in Wordsworth's exquisite poem of Ruth, and were the early scene of joint wanderings on the part of the two poets, when Wordsworth and his sister tenanted Alfoxton, during the minority of Mr. St. Aubyn.

lations, opium operated unfavourably in one respect, by often causing him to leave them unfinished. This is true. Whenever Coleridge (being highly charged, or saturated, with opium) had written with distempered vigour upon any question, there occurred soon after a recoil of intense disgust, not from his own paper only, but even from the entire subject. All opium-eaters are tainted with the infirmity of leaving works unfinished, and suffering reactions of disgust; but Coleridge taxed himself with that infirmity in verse before he could at all have commenced opium-eating. Besides, it is too much assumed by Coleridge and by his biographer that to leave off opium was of course to regain juvenile health. Indeed all opium-eaters, or indulgers in alcohol, make the mistake of supposing every pain or irritation which they suffer to be the product of the stimulant used, whereas a wise man will say, Suppose you do leave off opium, that will not deliver you from the load of years (say sixty-three) which you carry on your back. Charles Lamb, another man of true genius, and another head belonging to the Blackwood gallery, made that mistake in his Confessions of a Drunkard. "I looked back," says he, "to the time when always, on waking in the morning, I had a song rising to my lips." At present, it seems, being a drunkard, he has no such song. Ay, dear Lamb, but note this, that the drunkard was fifty-six years old, while the songster was twenty-three. Take twenty-three from fifty-six, and we have heard it said that thirty-three will remain: at least Cocker, who was a very obstinate man, went to his grave in that persuasion. But that extra burthen of thirty-three years is a pretty good reason for not singing in the morning, even if brandy has been out of the question.

It is singular, as respects Coleridge, that Mr Gillman never says one word upon the event of the great Highgate experiment for leaving off laudanum, though Coleridge came to Mr. Gillman's for no other purpose; and in a week, this vast creation of new earth, sea, and all that in them is, was to have been accomplished. We incline to fancy that the explosion must have hung fire. But that is a trifle. We have another pleasing hypothesis on the subject. Mr. Wordsworth, in his exquisite lines written on a fly-leaf of his own

Castle of Indolence, having described Coleridge as a "noticeable man with large gray eyes," goes on to say, "He" (viz. Coleridge) "did that other man entice" to view his imagery. Now, we are sadly afraid that "the noticeable man with large gray eyes" did entice "that other man," viz. Gillman, to commence opium-eating. This is droll, and it makes us laugh horribly. Gillman should have reformed him, viz. Samuel Taylor Coleridge; and lo, he corrupts Gillman! Coleridge visited Highgate by way of being converted from the heresy of opium; and the issue is that in two months' time various grave men, amongst whom our friend Gillman marches first in great pomp, are found to have faces shining and glorious as that of Æsculapius—a fact of which we have already explained the secret meaning. And scandal says (but, then, what will not scandal say?) that a hogshhead of laudanum goes up every third month through Highgate tunnel. Surely one corroboration of our hypothesis may be found in the fact that Vol. I of Gillman's Coleridge is for ever to stand unpropped by Vol. II; for we have already observed that opium-eaters, though good fellows upon the whole, never finish anything.

What then? A man has a right never to finish anything. Certainly he has, and by Magna Charta; but he has no right, by Magna Charta or by Parva Charta, to slander decent men like ourselves and our friend the author of the Opium Confessions. Here it is that our complaint arises against Mr. Gillman. If he has taken to opium-eating, can we help that? If his face shines, must our faces be blackened? He has very improperly published some intemperate passages from Coleridge's letters which ought to have been considered confidential unless Coleridge had left them for publication, charging upon the author of the Opium Confessions a reckless disregard of the temptations which in that work he was scattering abroad amongst men. Now, this author is connected with ourselves, and we cannot neglect his defence, unless in the case that he undertakes it himself.

We complain also that Coleridge raises (and is backed by Mr. Gillman in raising) a distinction, perfectly perplexing to us, between himself and the author of the Opium Confessions, upon the question why they severally began the practice of opium-eating.<sup>1</sup> In himself, it seems, this motive was to relieve pain, whereas the confessor was surreptitiously seeking for pleasure. Ay, indeed! where did he learn that? We have no copy of the Confessions here; so we cannot quote chapter and verse; but we distinctly remember that toothache is recorded in that book as the particular occasion which first introduced the author to the knowledge of opium. Whether afterwards, having been thus initiated by the demon of pain, the opium-confessor did not apply powers thus discovered to purposes of mere pleasure, is a question for himself; and the same question applies with the same cogency to Coleridge. Coleridge began in rheumatic pains. What then? This is no proof that he did not end in voluptuousness. For our part, we are slow to believe that ever any man did or could learn the somewhat awful truth, that in a certain ruby-coloured elixir there lurked a divine power to chase away the genius of pain, or secondly, of ennui (which it is, far more than pain, that saddens our human life), without sometimes, and to some extent, abusing this power. To taste but once from the tree of knowledge is fatal to the subsequent power of abstinence. True it is that generations have used laudanum as an anodyne (for instance, hospital patients) who have not afterwards courted its powers as a voluptuous stimulant; but that, be sure, has arisen from no abstinence in them. There are, in fact, two classes of temperaments as to this terrific drug—those which are, and those which are not, preformed to its power; those which genially expand to its temptations, and those which frostily exclude them. Not in the energies of the will, but in the qualities of the nervous organisation, lies the dread arbitration of—Fall or stand: doomed thou art to yield, or strengthened constitutionally to resist. Most of those who have but a low sense of the spells lying couchant in opium have practically none at all, for the initial fascination is for them effectually defeated by the sickness which nature has associated with the first stages of opium-eating. But to that other class whose nervous sensibilities vibrate to their profoundest depths under the first touch of the angelic poison, even as a lover's ear thrills on hearing unexpectedly the voice of her whom he loves, opium is the Amreeta cup of beatitude. You know the Paradise Lost? and you remember from the eleventh book, in its earlier part, that laudanum must already have existed in Eden—nay, that it was used medicinally by an archangel: for, after Michael had “purged with cuphrasy and rue” the eyes of Adam, lest he should be unequal to the mere sight of the great visions about to unfold their draperies before him, next he fortifies his fleshly spirits against the affliction of these visions, of which visions the first was death. And how?

<sup>1</sup> See ante, Vol. III. p. 225 —M.

“He from the well of life three drops instilled”

What was their operation?

“So deep the power of these ingredients pierced,
Even to the inmost seat of mental sight,
 That Adam, now enforced to close his eyes,
 Sank down, and all his spirits became entranced
 But him the gentle angel by the hand
 Soon raised———”

The second of these lines it is which betrays the presence of laudanum. It is in the faculty of mental vision, it is in the increased power of dealing with the shadowy and the dark, that the characteristic virtue of opium lies. Now, in the original higher sensibility is found some palliation for the practice of opium-eating; in the greater temptation lies a greater excuse. And in this faculty of self-revelation is found some palliation for reporting the case to the world; which palliation both Coleridge and his biographer have overlooked.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Though De Quincey cuts short the reprinted paper at this point the original in Blackwood for January 1845 had this dim editorial or quasi-editorial paragraph:—“On all this, however, we need say no more; for we have just received a note from the writer of the Opium Confessions, more learned than ourselves in such mysteries, which promises us a sequel or finale to those confessions. And this, which we have reason to think a record of profound experiences, we shall probably publish next month.” The sequel to De Quincey’s Opium Confessions so announced did begin to appear in Blackwood in March 1845.—M.

POSTSCRIPT<sup>1</sup>

FROM some misconception at the press, the account of Coleridge's personal appearance in the paper entitled Coleridge and Opium-Eating was printed off whilst yet imperfect, and, in fact, wanting its more interesting half. It had been suggested to me, as a proper offset to a very inaccurate report characterising Coleridge's person and conversation by an American traveller, who had, however, the excuse that his visit was a very hasty one, and that Coleridge had then become corpulent and heavy—wearing some indications that already (though, according to my present remembrance, not much more than forty-eight at that time) he had entered within the shadows of premature old age. The authorities for my counter-report are—1. A Bristol lady who with her sisters had become successors in a young ladies' boarding-school to the celebrated Hannah More; 2. Wordsworth, in his supplementary stanzas to the Castle of Indolence; 3. Two (if not three) artists. These shall be first called into court, as deposing to Coleridge's figure, i.e. to the permanent base in the description—all the rest being fugitive accompaniments. One of these artists, who is now no longer such, took down, in the year 1810, at Allan Bank, Grasmere, the exact measurements of both Samuel Taylor Coleridge and William Wordsworth (at that time the host of Coleridge and myself). His memorandum on that occasion is missing. But, as he found the two poets agreeing in height to a hair's-breadth,—which I myself, as an attentive bystander, can vouch for,—it will be sufficient for me to refer the curious reader to the Autobiography of Haydon, in whose studio Wordsworth was measured with technical nicety on a day regularly dated. The report is—5 feet 10 inches, within a trifling fraction; and the same report, therefore, stands good to a nicety for Coleridge. Next, for the face and bearing of Coleridge at the time referred to by the lady (1796), an ample authority is found in Wordsworth's fine stanzas—“Ah! piteous sight it was” [I cannot recall the two or three words of filling up] “when he,”

<sup>1</sup> This, properly printed here as a Postscript, appeared as a "Prefatory Note" to the volume of De Quincey's collected writings containing the paper to which it belongs—M.

“This man, came back to us a withered flower.”<sup>1</sup>

That was perhaps in 1807, when he returned from Malta, where it was that, from solitude too intense, he first took opium in excess. But in 1796, whilst yet apparently unacquainted with opium,

“Noisy he was, and gamesome as a boy,
Tossing his limbs about him in delight.”

Happiest and most genial he then was of all that taste the morning breezes of life. From Wordsworth we learn (what afterwards my own experience verified) that his eyes were large, and in colour were grey:—

“Profound his forehead was, but not severe;
And some did think” [viz in the Castle of Indolence] “that he had little business there”<sup>2</sup>

The lady, as her little contribution to this pre-nic portrait, insisted on his beautiful black hair, which lay in masses of natural curls half-way down his back. Among all his

<sup>1</sup> Wordsworth's lines (in his Stanzas written in my Pocket-Copy of Thomson's Castle of Indolence) are —

“Ah! piteous sight it was to see this Man
When he came back to us, a withered flower.”—M.

<sup>2</sup> Quoted more correctly, the lines are—

“Noisy he was, and, gamesome as a boy,
His limbs would toss about him with delight.”—M.

<sup>3</sup> More correctly—

“Profound his forehead was, though not severe;
Yet some did think that he had little business here.”—M.

foibles, however, it ought to be mentioned that vanity connected with personal advantages was never one: he had been thoroughly laughed out of that by his long experience of life at a great public school. But that which he himself utterly ignored female eyes bore witness to; and the lady of Bristol assured me that in the entire course of her life she had not seen a young man so engaging by his exterior. He was then a very resurrection of the old knight's son in Chaucer, of him that had jousted with infidels

“ And ridden in Bêlmärie.”

I should add that, whereas throughout his thirty-five years of opium he was rather corpulent,—not at any period emaciated, as those who write romances about opium fancy to be its effect,—in 1796, when he had nearly accomplished his twenty-sixth year, he was slender in the degree most approved by ladies.

Such was Samuel Taylor Coleridge in 1796. Ask for him ten years later, and the vision had melted into air!

CHARLES LAMB<sup>1</sup>

It sounds paradoxical, but is not so in a bad sense, to say that in every literature of large compass some authors will be found to rest much of the interest which surrounds them on their essential non-popularity. They are good for the very reason that they are not in conformity to the current taste. They interest because to the world they are not interesting. They attract by means of their repulsion. Not as though it could separately furnish a reason for loving a book that the majority of men had found it repulsive. Prima facie, it must suggest some presumption against a book that it has failed to gain public attention. To have roused hostility, indeed, to have kindled a feud against its own principles or its temper, may happen to be a good sign. That argues power. Hatred may be promising. The deepest revolutions of mind sometimes begin in hatred. But simply to have left a reader unimpressed is in itself a neutral result, from which the inference is doubtful. Yet even that, even simple failure to impress, may happen at times to be a result from positive powers in a writer, from special originalities, such as rarely reflect themselves in the mirror of the ordinary understanding. It seems little to be perceived how much the great scriptural<sup>2</sup> idea of the worldly

<sup>1</sup> Appeared in the North British Review for November 1848,—the book reviewed being Final Memorials of Charles Lamb, by Thomas Noon Talfourd, 2 vols., London, 1848. Reprinted by De Quincey in 1858 in the ninth volume of his collected writings.—M.

<sup>2</sup> “Scriptural” we call it, because this element of thought, so indispensable to a profound philosophy of morals, is not simply more used in Scripture than elsewhere, but is so exclusively significant or

and the unworldly is found to emerge in literature as well as in life. In reality, the very same combinations of moral qualities, infinitely varied, which compose the harsh physiognomy of what we call worldliness in the living groups of life, must unavoidably present themselves in books. A library divides into sections of worldly and unworldly, even as a crowd of men divides into that same majority and minority. The world has an instinct for recognising its own, and recoils from certain qualities when exemplified in books, with the same disgust or defective sympathy as would have governed it in real life. From qualities, for instance, of childlike simplicity, of shy profundity, or of inspired self-communion, the world does and must turn away its face towards grosser, bolder, more determined, or more intelligible expressions of character and intellect, and not otherwise in literature, nor at all less in literature, than it does in the realities of life.

Charles Lamb, if any ever was, is amongst the class here contemplated; he, if any ever has, ranks amongst writers whose works are destined to be for ever unpopular, and yet for ever interesting; interesting, moreover, by means of those very qualities which guarantee their non-popularity. The same qualities which will be found forbidding to the world and the thoughtless, which will be found insipid to many even amongst robust and powerful minds, are exactly those which will continue to command a select audience in every generation. The prose essays, under the signature of Eliu, form the most delightful section amongst Lamb's works. They traverse a peculiar field of observation, sequestered from general interest; and they are composed in a spirit too delicate and unobtrusive to catch the ear of the noisy crowd, clamouring for strong sensations. But this retiring delicacy itself, the pensiveness chequered by gleams of the fanciful, and the humour that is touched with cross lights of pathos, together with the picturesque quaintness of the objects casually described, whether men, or things, or usages, and, in the rear of all this, the constant recurrence intelligible amidst the correlative ideas of Scripture as to be absolutely insusceptible of translation into classical Greek or classical Latin.

to ancient recollections and to decaying forms of household life, as things retiring before the tumult of new and revolutionary generations,—these traits in combination communicate to the papers a grace and strength of originality which nothing in any literature approaches, whether for degree or kind of excellence, except the most felicitous papers of Addison, such as those on Sir Roger de Coverley, and some others in the same vein of composition. They resemble Addison's papers also in the diction; which is natural and idiomatic, even to carelessness. They are equally faithful to the truth of nature; and in this only they differ remarkably—that the sketches of Elia reflect the stamp and impress of the writer's own character, whereas in all those of Addison the personal peculiarities of the delineator (though known to the reader from the beginning through the account of the club) are nearly quiescent. Now and then they are recalled into a momentary notice, but they do not act, or at all modify his pictures of Sir Roger or Will Wumble. They are slightly and amiably eccentric, but the Spectator himself, in describing them, takes the station of an ordinary observer.

Everywhere, indeed, in the writings of Lamb, and not merely in his Elia, the character of the writer co-operates in an under-current to the effect of the thing written. To understand, in the fullest sense, either the gaiety or the tenderness of a particular passage, you must have some insight into the particular bias of the writer's mind, whether native and original, or impressed gradually by the accidents of situation, whether simply developed out of predispositions by the action of life, or violently scorched into the constitution by some fierce fever of calamity. There is in modern literature a whole class of writers, though not a large one, standing within the same category: some marked originality of character in the writer becomes a co-efficient with what he says to a common result; you must sympathise with this personality in the author before you can appreciate the most significant parts of his views. In most books the writer figures as a mere abstraction, without sex or age or local station, whom the reader banishes from his thoughts. What is written seems to proceed from a blank intellect, not from a man clothed with fleshly peculiarities and differences. These peculiarities and differences neither do, nor (generally speaking) could intermingle with the texture of the thoughts, so as to modify their force or their direction. In such books, —and they form the vast majority,—there is nothing to be found or to be looked for beyond the direct objective. (Sit venia verbo !) But, in a small section of books, the objective in the thought becomes confluent with the subjective in the thinker—the two forces unite for a joint product ; and, fully to enjoy the product, or fully to apprehend either element, both must be known. It is singular, and worth inquiring into, for the reason that the Greek and Roman literature had no such books. Timon of Athens, or Diogenes, one may conceive qualified for this mode of authorship, had journalism existed to rouse them in those days ; their “articles” would no doubt have been fearfully caustic. But, as they failed to produce anything, and Lucian in an after age is scarcely characteristic enough for the purpose, perhaps we may pronounce Rabelais and Montaigne the earliest of writers in the class described. In the century following theirs came Sir Thomas Browne, and immediately after him La Fontaine. Then came Swift, Sterne, with others less distinguished : in Germany, Hippel, the friend of Kant, Harmann the obscure, and the greatest of the whole body—John Paul Fr. Richter. In him, from the strength and determinateness of his nature, as well as from the great extent of his writing, the philosophy of this interaction between the author as a human agency and his theme as an intellectual re-agency might best be studied. From him might be derived the largest number of cases illustrating boldly this absorption of the universal into the concrete—of the pure intellect into the human nature of the author. But nowhere could illustrations be found more interesting—shy, delicate, evanescent—shy as lightning, delicate and evanescent as the coloured pencillings on a frosty night from the northern lights,—than in the better parts of Lamb.

To appreciate Lamb, therefore, it is requisite that his character and temperament should be understood in their coyest and most wayward features. A capital defect it would be if these could not be gathered silently from Lamb's works themselves. It would be a fatal mode of dependency upon an alien and separable accident if they needed an external commentary. But they do not. The syllables lurk up and down the writings of Lamb which decipher his eccentric nature. His character lies there dispersed in anagram ; and to any attentive reader the regathering and restoration of the total word from its scattered parts is inevitable without an effort. Still it is always a satisfaction, in knowing a result, to know also its why and how, and in so far as every character is likely to be modified by the particular experience, sad or joyous, through which the life has travelled, it is a good contribution towards the knowledge of that resulting character as a whole to have a sketch of that particular experience. What trials did it impose ? What energies did it task ? What temptations did it unfold ? These calls upon the moral powers, which in music so stormy many a life is doomed to hear, how were they faced ? The character in a capital degree moulds oftentimes the life, but the life always in a subordinate degree moulds the character. And, the character being in this case of Lamb so much of a key to the writings, it becomes important that the life should be traced, however briefly, as a key to the character.

That is one reason for detaining the reader with some slight record of Lamb's career. Such a record by preference and of right belongs to a case where the intellectual display, which is the sole ground of any public interest at all in the man, has been intensely modified by the humanities and moral personalities distinguishing the subject. We read a Physiology, and need no information as to the life and conversation of its author ; a meditative poem becomes far better understood by the light of such information ; but a work of genial and at the same time eccentric sentiment, wandering upon untrodden paths, is barely intelligible without it. There is a good reason for arresting judgment on the writer, that the court may receive evidence on the life of the man. But there is another reason, and, in any other place, a better ; which reason lies in the extraordinary value of the life considered separately for itself. Logically, it is not allowable to say that here ; and, considering the principal purpose of this paper, any possible independent value of the life must rank as a better reason for reporting it,—since, in a case where the original object is professedly to estimate the writings of a man, whatever promises to further that object must, merely by that tendency, have, in relation to that place, a momentary advantage which it would lose if valued upon a more abstract scale. Liberated from this casual office of throwing light upon a book—raised to its grander station of a solemn deposition to the moral capacities of man in conflict with calamity—viewed as a return made into the chanceries of heaven upon an issue directed from that court to try the amount of power lodged in a poor desolate pair of human creatures for facing the very anarchy of storms—this obscure life of the two Lambs, brother and sister (for the two lives were one life), rises into a grandeur that is not paralleled once in a generation.

Rich, indeed, in moral instruction was the life of Charles Lamb; and perhaps in one chief result it offers to the thoughtful observer a lesson of consolation that is awful, and of hope that ought to be immortal, viz in the record which it furnishes that by meekness of submission, and by earnest conflict with evil in the spirit of cheerfulness, it is possible ultimately to disarm or to blunt the very heaviest of curses—even the curse of lunacy. Had it been whispered, in hours of infancy, to Lamb, by the angel who stood by his cradle—“Thou, and the sister that walks by ten years before thee, shall be through life, each to each, the solitary fountain of comfort; and, except it be from this fountain of mutual love, except it be as brother and sister, ye shall not taste the cup of peace on earth!”—here, if there was sorrow in reversion, there was also consolation.

But what funeral swamps would have instantly engulfed this consolation, had some meddling fiend prolonged the revelation, and, holding up the curtain from the sad future a little longer, had said scornfully—“Peace on earth! Peace for you two, Charles and Mary Lamb! What peace is possible under the curse which even now is gathering against your heads? Is there peace on earth for the lunatic—peace for the parenticide—peace for the girl that, without warning, and without time granted for a penitential cry to Heaven, sends her mother to the last audit?” And then, without treachery, speaking bare truth, this prophet of woe might have added—"Thou also, thyself, Charles Lamb, thou in thy proper person, shalt enter the skirts of this dreadful hail-storm; even thou shalt taste the secrets of lunacy, and enter as a captive its house of bondage<sup>1</sup>; whilst over thy sister the accursed scorpion shall hang suspended through life, like Death hanging over the beds of hospitals, striking at times, but more often threatening to strike; or withdrawing its instant menaces only to lay bare her mind more bitterly to the persecutions of a haunted memory!" Considering the nature of the calamity, in the first place; considering, in the second place, its life-long duration; and, in the last place, considering the quality of the resistance by which it was met, and under what circumstances of humble resources in money or friends: we have come to the deliberate judgment that the whole range of history scarcely presents a more affecting spectacle of perpetual sorrow, humiliation, or conflict, and that was supported to the end (that is, through forty years) with more resignation, or with more absolute victory.

Charles Lamb was born in February of the year 1775. His immediate descent was humble; for his father, though on one particular occasion civilly described as a "scrivener," was in reality a domestic servant to Mr. Salt—a bencher (and, therefore, a barrister of some standing) in the Inner Temple. John Lamb, the father, belonged by birth to Lincoln; from which city, being transferred to London whilst yet a boy, he entered the service of Mr. Salt without delay, and apparently from this period, throughout his life, continued in this good man's household to support the honourable relation of a Roman client to his patronus, much more than that of a mercenary servant to a transient and capricious master. The terms on which Mr. S. seems to have lived with the family of the Lambs argue a kindness and a liberality of nature on both sides. John Lamb recommended himself as an attendant by the versatility of his accomplishments; and Mr. Salt, being a widower without children,—which means, in effect, an old bachelor,—naturally valued that encyclopædic range of dexterity which made his house independent of external aid for every mode of service. To kill one's own mutton is but an operose way of arriving at a dinner, and often a more costly way, whereas to combine one's own carpenter, locksmith, hairdresser, groom, &c., all in one man's person—to have a Robinson Crusoe, up to all emergencies of life, always in waiting—is a luxury of the highest class for one who values his ease.

<sup>1</sup> Lamb was himself confined for six weeks at one period of his life in a lunatic asylum.

A consultation is held more freely with a man familiar to one's eye, and more profitably with a man aware of one's peculiar habits. And another advantage from such an arrangement is, that one gets any little alteration or repair executed on the spot. To hear is to obey, and by an inversion of Pope's rule—

“One always is, and never to be, blest.”

People of one sole accomplishment, like the homo unius libri, are usually within that narrow circle disagreeably perfect, and, therefore, apt to be arrogant. People who can do all things usually do every one of them ill; and, living in a constant effort to deny this too palpable fact, they become irritably vain. But Mr Lamb the elder seems to have been bent on perfection. He did all things; he did them all well; and yet was neither gloomily arrogant, nor testily vain. And, being conscious apparently that all mechanic excellencies tend to illiberal results, unless counteracted by perpetual sacrifices to the graces, he went so far as to cultivate poetry; he even printed his poems; and, were we possessed of a copy (which we are not, nor probably is the Vatican), it would give us pleasure at this point to digress for a moment, and to cut them up, purely on considerations of respect to the author's memory. It is hardly to be supposed that they did not really merit castigation; and we should best show the sincerity of our respect for Mr. Lamb senior, in all those cases where we could conscientiously profess respect, by an unlimited application of the knout in the cases where we could not.

The whole family of the Lambs seems to have won from Mr. Salt the consideration which is granted to humble friends, and from acquaintances nearer to their own standing to have won a tenderness of esteem such as is granted to decayed gentry. Yet, naturally, the social rank of the parents, as people still living, must have operated disadvantageously for the children. It is hard, even for the practised philosopher, to distinguish aristocratic graces of manner, and capacities of delicate feeling, in people whose very hearth and dress bear witness to the servile humility of their station. Yet such distinctions, as wild gifts of nature, timidly and half unconsciously asserted themselves in the unpretending Lambs. Already in their favour there existed a silent privilege analogous to the famous one of Lord Kinsale.<sup>1</sup> He, by special grant from the crown, is allowed, when standing before the king, to forget that he is not himself a king: the bearer of that peerage, through all generations, has the privilege of wearing his hat in the royal presence. By a general though tacit concession of the same nature, the rising generation of the Lambs, John and Charles, the two sons, and Mary Lamb, the only daughter, were permitted to forget that their grandmother had been a housekeeper for sixty years, and that their father had worn a livery. Charles Lamb, individually, was so entirely humble, and so careless of social distinctions, that he has taken pleasure in recurring to these very facts in the family records amongst the most genial of his Elia recollections. He only continued to remember, without shame, and with a peculiar tenderness, these badges of plebeian rank, when everybody else, amongst the few survivors that could have known of their existence, had long dismissed them from their thoughts.

Probably through Mr Salt's interest it was that Charles Lamb, in the autumn of 1782, when he wanted something more than four months of completing his eighth year, received a presentation to the magnificent school of Christ's Hospital. The late Dr Arnold, when contrasting the school of his own boyish experience, Winchester, with Rugby, the school confided to his management, found nothing so much to regret in the circumstances of the latter as its forlorn condition with respect to historical traditions. Wherever these were wanting, it occurred to Dr Arnold that something of a compensatory effect for impressing the imagination might be obtained by connecting every important school with the nation through the link of annual prizes issuing from the Exchequer. An official basis of national patronage might prove a substitute for an antiquarian or ancestral basis. Happily for the great educational foundations of London, none of them is in the naked condition of Rugby. Westminster, St Paul's, Merchant Tailors', the Charter-house, &c., are all crowned with historical recollections; and Christ's Hospital, besides the original honours of its foundation, so fitted to a consecrated place in a youthful imagination—an asylum for boy-students, provided by a boy-king (Edward VI)—a king innocent, religious, prematurely wise, and prematurely called away from earth—has also a mode of perpetual connexion with the state. It enjoys, therefore, both of Dr Arnold's advantages. Indeed, all the great foundation schools of London, bearing in their very codes of organisation the impress of a double function—viz. the conservation of sound learning and of pure religion—wear something of a monastic or cloistral character in their aspect and usages, which is peculiarly impressive, and even pathetic, amidst the uproars of a capital the most colossal and tumultuous upon earth.

<sup>1</sup> Whom, by the way, a modern Peerage tells us that, strictly speaking (or rather strictly spelling), we ought to call Kingsale. Very possibly. But, if so, we have been wrong throughout our whole erroneous life, and it is too late now to correct our spelling.

Here Lamb remained until his fifteenth year; which year threw him on the world, and brought him alongside the golden dawn of the French Revolution. Here he learned a little elementary Greek, and of Latin more than a little; for his Latin notes to Mr. Cary (of Dante celebrity), though brief, are sufficient to reveal a true sense of what is graceful and idiomatic in Latinity. We say this, who have studied that subject more than most men. It is not that Lamb would have found it an easy task to compose a long paper in Latin—nobody can find it easy to do what he has no motive for habitually practising; but a single sentence of Latin wearing the secret countersign of the "sweet Roman hand" ascertains sufficiently that, in reading Latin classics, a man feels and comprehends their peculiar force or beauty. That is enough. It is requisite to a man's expansion of mind that he should make acquaintance with a literature so radically differing from all modern literature as is the Latin. It is not requisite that he should practise Latin composition. Here, therefore, Lamb obtained in sufficient perfection one priceless accomplishment, which even singly throws a graceful air of liberality over all the rest of a man's attainments : having rarely any pecuniary value, it challenges the more attention to its intellectual value. Here also Lamb commenced the friendships of his life ; and of all which he formed he lost none. Here it was, as the consummation and crown of his advantages from the time-honoured hospital, that he came to know "Poor S. T. C."<sup>1</sup>

 τὸν θαυμάσιωτατον.

Until 1796, it is probable that he lost sight of Coleridge, who was then occupied with Cambridge, having been transferred thither as a privileged "Grecian" from Christ's Hospital. That year, 1796, was a year of change and fearful calamity for Charles Lamb. On that year revolved the wheels of his after life. During the three years succeeding to his school days, he had held a clerkship in the South Sea House. In 1795, he was transferred to the India House. As a junior clerk, he could not receive more than a slender salary, but even this was important to the support of his parents and sister. They lived together in lodgings near Holborn ; and in the spring of 1796 Miss Lamb (having previously shown signs of lunacy at intervals), in a sudden paroxysm of her disease, seized a knife from the dinner table, and stabbed her mother, who died upon the spot. A coroner's inquest easily ascertained the nature of a case which was transparent in all its circumstances, and never for a moment indecisive as regarded the medical symptoms. The poor young lady was transferred to the establishment for lunatics at Hoxton. She soon recovered, we believe ; but her relapses were as sudden as her recoveries, and she continued through life to revisit, for periods of uncertain seclusion, that house of woe. This calamity of his fireside, followed soon after by the death of his father, who had for some time been in a state of imbecility, determined the future destiny of Lamb.

<sup>1</sup> "Poor S. T. C." —The affecting expression by which Coleridge indicates himself in the few lines written during his last illness for an inscription upon his own grave, lines ill constructed in point of diction and compression, but otherwise speaking from the depths of his heart.

Apprehending, with the perfect grief of perfect love, that his sister's fate was sealed for life—viewing her as his own greatest benefactress, which she really had been through her advantage by ten years of age—yielding with impassioned readiness to the depth of his fraternal affection what at any rate he would have yielded to the sanctities of duty as interpreted by his own conscience—he resolved for ever to resign all thoughts of marriage with a young lady whom he loved, for ever to abandon all ambitious prospects that might have tempted him into uncertainties, humbly to content himself with the certainities of his Indian clerkship, to dedicate himself for the future to the care of his desolate and prostrate sister, and to leave the rest to God. These sacrifices he made in no hurry or tumult, but deliberately, and in religious tranquillity. These sacrifices were accepted in heaven; and even on this earth they had their reward. She, for whom he gave up all, in turn gave up all for him. She devoted herself to his comfort. Many times she returned to the lunatic establishment, but many times she was restored to illuminate the household hearth for him, and, of the happiness which for forty years and more he had, no hour seemed true that was not derived from her. Henceforward, therefore, until he was emancipated by the noble generosity of the East India Directors, Lamb's time, for nine-and-twenty years, was given to the India House.

"O fortunati nimium, sua si bona nônt," is applicable to more people than "agricolæ." Clerks of the India House are as blind to their own advantages as the blindest of ploughmen. Lamb was summoned, it is true, through the larger and more genial section of his life, to the drudgery of a copying clerk—making confidential entries into mighty folios, on the subject of calicoes and muslins. By this means, whether he would or not, he became gradually the author of a great "serial" work, in a frightful number of volumes, on as dry a department of literature as the children of the great desert could have suggested. Nobody, he must have felt, was ever likely to study this great work of his, not even Dr. Dryasdust. He had written in vain; which is not pleasant to know. There would be no second edition called for by a discerning public in Leadenhall Street; not a chance of that.

And consequently the opera omnia of Lamb, drawn up in a hideous battalion, at the cost of labour so enormous, would be known only to certain families of spiders in one generation, and of rats in the next. Such a labour of Sisyphus,—the rolling up a ponderous stone to the summit of a hill only that it might roll back again by the gravitation of its own dulness,—seems a bad employment for a man of genius in his meridian energies. And yet, perhaps not. Perhaps the collective wisdom of Europe could not have devised for Lamb a more favourable condition of toil than this very India House clerkship. His works (his Leadenhall Street works) were certainly not read; popular they could not be, for they were not read by anybody; but then, to balance that, they were not reviewed. His folios were of that order which (in Cowper's words) "not even critics criticize." Is that nothing? Is it no happiness to escape the hands of merciless reviewers? Many of us escape being read; the worshipful reviewer does not find time to read a line of us; but we do not for that reason escape being criticised, "shown up," and martyred. The list of errata, again, committed by Lamb was probably of a magnitude to alarm any possible compositor; and yet these errata will never be known to mankind. They are dead and buried. They have been cut off prematurely, and, for any effect upon their generation, might as well never have existed. Then the returns, in a pecuniary sense, from these folios—how important were they! It is not common, certainly, to write folios, but neither is it common to draw a steady income of from £300 to £400 per annum from volumes of any size. This will be admitted, but would it not have been better to draw the income without the toil? Doubtless it would always be more agreeable to have the rose without the thorn. But in the case before us, taken with all its circumstances, we deny that the toil is truly typified as a thorn; so far from being a thorn in Lamb's daily life, on the contrary, it was a second rose ingrafted upon the original rose of the income, that he had to earn it by a moderate but continued exertion. Holidays, in a national establishment so great as the India House, and in our too fervid period, naturally could not be frequent; yet all great English corporations are gracious masters, and indulgences of this nature could be obtained on a special application. Not to count upon these accidents of favour, we find that the regular toil of those in Lamb's situation began at ten in the morning, and ended as the clock struck four in the afternoon. Six hours composed the daily contribution of labour,—that is, precisely one-fourth part of the total day. But, as Sunday was exempted, the rigorous expression of the quota was one-fourth of six-sevenths, which makes only six twenty-eighths and not six twenty-fourths of the total time. Less toil than this would hardly have availed to deepen the sense of value in that large part of the time still remaining disposable. Had there been any resumption whatever of labour in the evening, though but for half an hour, that one encroachment upon the broad continuous area of the eighteen free hours would have killed the tranquillity of the whole day, by sowing it (so to speak) with intermitting anxieties— anxieties that, like tides, would still be rising and falling. Whereas now, at the early hour of four, when daylight is yet lingering in the air, even at the dead of winter, in the latitude of London, and when the enjoying section of the day is barely commencing, everything is left which a man would care to retain. A mere dilettante or amateur student, having no mercenary interest concerned, would, upon a refinement of luxury—would, upon choice—give up so much time to study, were it only to sharpen the value of what remained for pleasure. And thus the only difference between the scheme of the India House distributing his time for Lamb, and the scheme of a wise voluptuary distributing his time for himself, lay, not in the amount of time deducted from enjoyment, but in the particular mode of appropriating that deduction. An intellectual appropriation of the time, though casually fatiguing, must have pleasures of its own; pleasures denied to a task so mechanic and so monotonous as that of reiterating endless records of sales or consignments not essentially varying from each other. True, it is pleasanter to pursue an intellectual study than to make entries in a ledger. But even an intellectual toil is toil; few people can support it for more than six hours in a day. And the only question, therefore, after all, is, at what period of the day a man would prefer taking this pleasure of study. Now, upon that point, as regards the case of Lamb, there is no opening for doubt. He, amongst his Popular Fallacies, humorously illustrates the necessity of evening and artificial lights to the prosperity of studies. After exposing, with the perfection of fun, the savage unsociality of those elder ancestors who lived (if life it was) before lamp-light was invented,—showing that “jokes came in with candles,” since “what repartees could have passed” when people were “grunbling at one another in the dark,” and “when you must have felt about for a smile, and handled a neighbour’s cheek to be sure that he understood it?”—he goes on to say, “This accounts for the seriousness of the elder poetry,” viz because they had no candle-light. Even eating he objects to as a very imperfect thing in the dark; you are not convinced that a dish tastes as it should do by the promise of its name, if you dine in the twilight without candles. Seemg is believing. “The senses absolutely give and take reciprocally.” The sight guarantees the taste. For instance, “Can you tell pork from veal in the dark, or distinguish Shermies from pure Malaga?” To all enjoyments whatsoever candles are indispensable as an adjunct; but, as to reading, “there is,” says Lamb, “absolutely no such thing “but by a candle. We have tried the affectation of a book “at noon-day in gardens, but it was labour thrown away. “It is a mockery, all that is reported of the influential “Phœbus. No true poem ever owed its birth to the sun’s “light. The mild internal light, that reveals the fine “shapings of poetry, like fires on the domestic hearth, goes “out in the sunshine. Milton’s morning hymn in Paradise, “we would hold a good wager, was penned at midnight, “and Taylor’s rich description of a sunrise smells decidedly “of the taper.” This view of evening and candle-light, as involved in the full delight of literature, may seem no more than a pleasant extravaganza; and no doubt it is in the nature of such gaieties to travel a little into exaggeration; but substantially it is certain that Lamb’s sincere feelings pointed habitually in the direction here indicated. His literary studies, whether taking the colour of tasks or diversions, courted the aid of evening, which, by means of physical weariness, produces a more luxurious state of repose than belongs to the labour hours of day; they courted the aid of lamp-light, which, as Lord Bacon remarked, gives a gorgeousness to human pomps and pleasures, such as would be vainly sought from the homeliness of day-light. The hours, therefore, which were withdrawn from his own control by the India House happened to be exactly that part of the day which Lamb least valued, and could least have turned to account.

The account given of Lamb's friends,—of those whom he endeavoured to love because he admired them, or to esteem intellectually because he loved them personally,—is too much coloured for general acquiescence by Sergeant (since Mr. Justice) Talfourd's own early prepossessions. It is natural that an intellectual man like the Sergeant, personally made known in youth to people whom from childhood he had regarded as powers in the ideal world, and in some instances as representing the eternities of human speculation, since their names had perhaps dawned upon his mind in concurrence with the very earliest suggestion of topics which they had treated, should overrate their intrinsic grandeur. Hazlitt accordingly is styled "the great thinker." But, had he even been such potentially, there was an absolute bar to his achievement of that station in act and consummation. No man can be a great thinker in our days upon large and elaborate questions without being also a great student. To think profoundly, it is indispensable that a man should have read down to his own starting-point, and have read as a collating student to the particular stage at which he himself takes up the subject. At this moment, for instance, how could Geology be treated otherwise than childishly by one who should rely upon the encyclopædias of 1800? or Comparative Physiology by the most ingenious of men unacquainted with Marshall Hall, and with the apocalyptic glimpses of secrets unfolding under the hands of Professor Owen? In such a condition of undisciplined thinking, the ablest man thinks to no purpose. He lingers upon parts of the inquiry that have lost the importance which once they had under imperfect charts of the subject; he wastes his strength upon problems that have become obsolete; he loses his way in paths that are not in the line of direction upon which the improved speculation is moving; or he gives narrow conjectural solutions of difficulties that have long since received sure and comprehensive ones. It is as if a man should in these days attempt to colonize, and yet, through inertia or through ignorance, should leave behind him all modern resources of chemistry, of chemical agriculture, or of steam-power. Hazlitt had read nothing. Unacquainted with Grecian philosophy, with Scholastic philosophy, and with the recomposition of these philosophies in the booms of Germany during the last seventy and odd years, trusting merely to the untramed instincts of keen mother-wit—whence should Hazlitt have had the materials for great thinking? It is through the collation of many abortive voyages to polar regions that a man gains his first chance of entering the polar basin, or of running ahead on the true line of approach to it. The very reason for Hazlitt's defect in eloquence as a lecturer is sufficient also as a reason why he could not have been a comprehensive thinker. "He was not eloquent," says the Sergeant, "in the true sense of the term." But why? Because it seems "his thoughts were too weighty to be moved along by the shallow stream of feeling which an evening's excitement can rouse,"—an explanation which leaves us in doubt whether Hazlitt forfeited his chance of eloquence by accommodating himself to this evening's excitement, or by gloomily resisting it. Our own explanation is different. Hazlitt was not eloquent, because he was discontinuous. No man can be eloquent whose thoughts are abrupt, insulated, capricious, and (to borrow an impressive word from Coleridge) non-sequacious. Eloquence resides not in separate or fractional ideas, but in the relations of manifold ideas, and in the mode of their evolution from each other. It is not indeed enough that the ideas should be many, and their relations coherent; the main condition lies in the key of the evolution, in the law of the succession. The elements are nothing without the atmosphere that moulds, and the dynamic forces that combine. Now Hazlitt's brilliancy is seen chiefly in separate splinterings of phrase or image which throw upon the eye a vitreous scintillation for a moment, but spread no deep suffusions of colour, and distribute no masses of mighty shadow. A flash, a solitary flash, and all is gone. Rhetoric, according to its quality, stands in many degrees of relation to the permanencies of truth ; and all rhetoric, like all flesh, is partly unreal, and the glory of both is fleeting. Even the mighty rhetoric of Sir Thomas Browne, or Jeremy Taylor, to whom only it has been granted to open the trumpet-stop on that great organ of passion, oftentimes leaves behind it the sense of sadness which belongs to beautiful apparitions starting out of darkness upon the morbid eye, only to be reclaimed by darkness in the instant of their birth, or which belongs to pageantries in the clouds. But, if all rhetoric is a mode of pyrotechny, and all pyrotechnics are by necessity fugitive, yet even in these frail pomps there are many degrees of frailty. Some fireworks require an hour's duration for the expansion of their glory ; others, as if formed from fulminating powder, expire in the very act of birth. Precisely on that scale of duration and of power stand the glitterings of rhetoric that are not worked into the texture, but washed on from the outside. Hazlitt's thoughts were of the same fractured and discontinuous order as his illustrative images—seldom or never self-diffusive ; and that is a sufficient argument that he had never cultivated philosophic thinking.

Not, however, to conceal any part of the truth, we are bound to acknowledge that Lamb thought otherwise on this point, manifesting what seemed to us an extravagant admiration of Hazlitt, and perhaps even in part for that very glitter which we are denouncing—at least he did so in conversation with ourselves. But, on the other hand, as this conversation travelled a little into the tone of a disputation, and our frost on this point might seem to justify some undue fervour by way of balance, it is very possible that Lamb did not speak his absolute and most dispassionate judgment. And yet again, if he did, may we, with all reverence for Lamb's exquisite genius, have permission to say that his own constitution of intellect sinned by this very habit of discontinuity. It was a habit of mind not unlikely to be cherished by his habits of life. Amongst these habits was the excess of his social kindness. He scorned so much to deny his company and his redundant hospitality to any man who manifested a wish for either by calling upon him, that he almost seemed to think it a criminality in himself if, by accident, he really was from home on your visit, rather than by possibility a negligence in you, that had not forewarned him of your intention. What was the consequence? All his life, from this and other causes, he must have read in the spirit of one liable to sudden interruption, like a dragoon, in fact, reading with one foot in the stirrup, when expecting momentarily a summons to mount for action. In such situations, reading by snatches, and by intervals of precarious leisure, people form inevitably the habit of seeking and unduly valuing condensations of the meaning, where in reality the truth suffers by this short-hand exhibition; or else they demand too vivid illustrations of the meaning. Lord Chesterfield, so brilliant a man by nature, already therefore making a morbid estimate of brilliancy, and so hurried throughout his life as a public man, read under this double coercion for craving instantaneous effects. At one period, his only time for reading was in the morning, whilst under the hands of his hairdresser,—who, in that age, or even thirty years later, was an artist that, more even than a tailor, ministered to respectability. Compelled to take the hastiest of flying shots at his author, naturally Lord Chesterfield demanded a very conspicuous mark to fire at. But the author could not, in so brief a space, be always sure to crowd any very prominent objects on the eye, unless by being audaciously oracular and peremptory as regarded the sentiment, or flashy in excess as regarded its expression. “Come now, my friend,” was Lord Chesterfield’s morning adjuration to his author, “come now, cut it short—don’t prose—don’t hum and haw.” The author had doubtless no ambition to enter his name on the honourable and ancient roll of gentlemen-prosers; probably he conceived himself not at all tainted with the asthmatic infirmity of humming and hawing; but, as to “cutting it short,” how could he be sure of meeting his lordship’s expectations in that point, unless by dismissing all the limitations that might be requisite to fit the idea for use, or the adjuncts that might be requisite to integrate its truth, or the final consequences that might involve some deep arrière pensée? To be lawfully and usefully brilliant, after this rapid fashion, a man must come forward as a refresher of old truths, where his suppressions are sup-pled by the reader's memory ; not as an expounder of new truths, where oftentimes a dislocated fraction of the true is not less dangerous than the false itself.

To read therefore habitually by hurried instalments has this bad tendency—that it is likely to found a taste for modes of composition too artificially irritating, and to disturb the equilibrium of the judgment in relation to the colourings of style. Lamb, however, whose constitution of mind was even ideally sound in reference to the natural, the simple, the genuine, might seem of all men least liable to a taint in this direction. And undoubtedly he was so as regarded those modes of beauty which nature had specially qualified him for apprehending. Else, and in relation to other modes of beauty, where his sense of the true, and of its distinction from the spurious, had been an acquired sense, it is impossible for us to hide from ourselves that, not through habits only, not through stress of injurious accidents only, but by original structure and temperament of mind, Lamb had a bias towards those very defects on which rested the startling characteristics of style which we have been noticing. He himself, we fear, not bribed by indulgent feelings to another, not moved by friendship, but by native tendency, shrank from the continuous, from the sustained, from the elaborate.

The elaborate, indeed, without which much truth and beauty must perish in germ, was by name the object of his invectives. The instances are many, in his own beautiful essays, where he literally collapses, literally sinks away from openings suddenly offering themselves to flights of pathos or solemnity in direct prosecution of his own theme. On any such summons, where an ascending impulse and an untired pinion were required, he refuses himself (to use military language) invariably. The least observing reader of Elia cannot have failed to notice that the most felicitous passages always accomplish their circuit in a few sentences. The gyration within which his sentiment wheels, no matter of what kind it may be, is always the shortest possible. It does not prolong itself—it does not repeat itself—it does not propagate itself. But, in fact, other features in Lamb's mind would have argued this feature by analogy, had we by accident been left unaware of it directly. It is not by chance, or without a deep ground in his nature, common to all his qualities, both affirmative and negative, that Lamb had an insensibility to music more absolute than can have been often shared by any human creature, or perhaps than was ever before acknowledged so candidly. The sense of music—as a pleasurable sense, or as any sense at all other than of certain unmeaning and impertinent differences in respect to high and low, sharp or flat—was utterly obliterated, as with a sponge, by nature herself from Lamb's organization. It was a corollary, from the same large substratum in his nature, that Lamb had no sense of the rhythmical in prose composition. Rhythmus, or pomp of cadence, or sonorous ascent of clauses, in the structure of sentences, were effects of art as much thrown away upon him as the voice of the charmer upon the deaf adder. We ourselves, occupying the very station of polar opposition to that of Lamb,—being as morbidly, perhaps, in the one excess as he in the other,—naturally detected this omission in Lamb's nature at an early stage of our acquaintance. Not the fabled Regulus, with his eyelids torn away, and his uncurtained eyeballs exposed to the noon-tide glare of a Carthaginian sun, could have shrieked with more anguish of recoil from torture than we from certain sentences and periods in which Lamb perceived no fault at all. Pomp, in our apprehension, was an idea of two categories: the pompous might be spurious, but it might also be genuine. It is well to love the simple—we love it; nor is there any opposition at all between that and the very glory of pomp. But, as we once put the case to Lamb, if, as a musician, as the leader of a mighty orchestra, you had this theme offered to you—"Belshazzar the King gave a great feast to a thousand of his lords"—or this, "And, on a certain day, Marcus Cicero stood up, and in a set speech rendered solemn thanks to Caius Cæsar for Quintus Ligarius pardoned, and for Marcus Marcellus restored"—surely no man would deny that, in such a case, simplicity, though in a passive sense not lawfully absent, must stand aside as totally insufficient for the positive part. Simplicity might guide even here, but could not furnish the power; a rudder it might be, but not an oar or a sail. This Lamb was ready to allow; as an intellectual quiddity, he recognised pomp in the character of a privileged thing; he was obliged to do so; for take away from great ceremonial festivals, such as the solemn rendering of thanks, the celebration of national anniversaries, the commemoration of public benefactors, &c., the element of pomp, and you take away their very meaning and life. But, whilst allowing a place for it in the rubric of the logician, it is certain that sensuously Lamb would not have sympathized with it, nor have felt its justification in any concrete instance. We find a difficulty in pursuing this subject without greatly exceeding the just limits. We pause, therefore, and add only this one suggestion as partly explanatory of the case. Lamb had the dramatic intellect and taste, perhaps in perfection; of the epic he had none at all. Here, as happens sometimes to men of genius preternaturally endowed in one direction, he might be considered as almost starved. A favourite of nature, so eminent in some directions, by what right could he complain that her bounties were not indiscriminate? From this defect in his nature it arose that, except by culture and by reflection, Lamb had no genial appreciation of Milton. The solemn planetary wheelings of the Paradise Lost were not to his taste. What he did comprehend were the motions like those of lightning, the fierce angular coruscations of that wild agency which comes forward so vividly in the sudden περιπέτεια, in the revolutionary catastrophe, and in the tumultuous conflicts, through persons or through situations, of the tragic drama.

There is another vice in Mr Hazlitt's mode of composition, viz. the habit of trite quotation, too common to have challenged much notice, were it not for these reasons.—1st, That Sergeant Talfourd speaks of it in equivocal terms, as a fault perhaps, but as a "felicitous" fault, "trailing after it a line of golden associations"; 2dly, Because sometimes it involves a dishonesty. On occasion of No. 1, we must profess our belief that a more ample explanation from the Sergeant would have left him in substantial harmony with ourselves. We cannot conceive the author of Ion, and the friend of Wordsworth, seriously to countenance that paralytic "mouth-diarrhœa" (to borrow a phrase of Coleridge's)—that fluxe de bouche (to borrow an earlier phrase of Archbishop Huet's)—which places the reader at the mercy of a man's tritest remembrances from his most school-boy reading. To have the verbal memory infested with tags of verse and "cues" of rhyme is in itself an infirmity as vulgar and as morbid as the stable-boy's habit of whistling slang airs upon the mere mechanical excitement of a bar or two whistled by some other blockhead in some other stable. The very stage has grown weary of ridiculing a folly that, having been long since expelled from decent society, has taken refuge amongst the most imbecile of authors. Was Mr Hazlitt, then, of that class? No; he was a man of splendid talents, and of capacity for greater things than he ever attempted, though without known pretensions of the philosophic kind ascribed to him by the Sergeant. Meantime the reason for resisting the example and practice of Hazlitt lies in this—that essentially it is at war with sincerity, the foundation of all good writing, to express one's own thoughts by another man's words. This dilemma arises. The thought is, or it is not, worthy of that emphasis which belongs to a metrical expression of it. If it is not, then we shall be guilty of a mere folly in pushing into strong relief that which confessedly cannot support it. If it is, then how incredible that a thought strongly conceived, and bearing upon it the impress of one's own individuality, should naturally, and without dissimulation or falsehood, bend to another man's expression of it! Simply to back one's own view by a similar view derived from another may be useful; a quotation that repeats one's own sentiment, but in a varied form, has the grace which belongs to the idem in alio, the same radical idea expressed with a difference—similarity in dissimilarity; but to throw one's own thoughts, matter and form, through alien organs so absolutely as to make another man one's interpreter for evil and good, is either to confess a singular laxity of thinking that can so flexibly adapt itself to any casual form of words, or else to confess that sort of carelessness about the expression which draws its real origin from a sense of indifference about the things to be expressed. Utterly at war this distressing practice is with all simplicity and earnestness of writing; it argues a state of indolent ease inconsistent with the pressure and coercion of strong fermenting thoughts before we can be at leisure for idle or chance quotations.

But, lastly, in reference to No. 2, we must add that the practice is sometimes dishonest. It "trails after it a line of golden associations." Yes, and the burglar, who leaves an army-tailor's after a midnight visit, trails after him perhaps a long roll of gold bullion epaulettes which may look pretty by lamp-light. But that, in the present condition of moral philosophy amongst the police, is accounted robbery; and to benefit too much by quotations is little less. At this moment we have in our eye a biographical work, at one time not without celebrity, which is one continued cento of splendid passages from other people. The natural effect from so much fine writing is that the reader rises with the impression of having been engaged upon a most eloquent work. Meantime the whole is a series of mosaics, a tessellation made up from borrowed fragments; and, first when the reader's attention is expressly directed upon the fact, he becomes aware that the nominal author has contributed nothing more to the book than a few passages of transition or brief clauses of connexion.

In the year 1796 the main incident occurring of any importance for English Literature was the publication by Southey of an epic poem. This poem, the Joan of Arc, was the earliest work of much pretension amongst all that Southey wrote, and by many degrees it was the worst. In the four great narrative poems of his later years there is a combination of two striking qualities, viz. a peculiar command over the visually splendid, connected with a deep-toned grandeur of moral pathos. Especially we find this union in the Thalaba and the Roderick; but in the Joan of Arc we miss it. What splendour there is for the fancy and the eye belongs chiefly to the Vision, contributed by Coleridge; and this was subsequently withdrawn. The fault lay in Southey's political relations at that era; his sympathy with the French Revolution in its earlier stages had been boundless; in all respects it was a noble sympathy, fading only as the gorgeous colouring faded from the emblazonries of that awful event, drooping only when the promises of that golden dawn sickened under stationary eclipse. In 1796 Southey was yet under the tyranny of his own earliest fascination; in his eyes the Revolution had suffered a momentary blight from reflexes of panic ; but blight of some kind is incident to every harvest on which human hopes are suspended. Bad auguries were also ascending from the unchaining of martial instincts. But that the Revolution, having ploughed its way through unparalleled storms, was preparing to face other storms, did but quicken the apprehensiveness of his love—did but quicken the duty of giving utterance to this love. Hence came the rapid composition of the poem, which cost less time in writing than in printing. Hence, also, came the choice of his heroine. What he needed in his central character was a heart with a capacity for the wrath of Hebrew prophets applied to ancient abuses, and for evangelic pity applied to the sufferings of nations. This heart, with this double capacity—where should he seek it? A French heart it must be, or how should it follow with its sympathies a French movement? There lay Southey's reason for adopting the Maid of Orleans as the depository of hopes and aspirations on behalf of France as fervid as his own. In choosing this heroine, so inadequately known at that time, Southey testified at least his own nobility of feeling<sup>1</sup> ; but in executing his choice he and his friends overlooked two faults fatal to his purpose. One was this. sympathy with the French Revolution meant sympathy with the opening prospects of man—meant sympathy with the Pariah of every clime—with all that suffered social wrong, or saddened in hopeless bondage.

<sup>1</sup> It is right to remind the reader of this, for a reason applying forcibly to the present moment. Michelet has taxed Englishmen with yielding to national animosities in the case of Joan, having no plea whatever for that insinuation but the single one drawn from Shakspeare's Henry VI. To this the answers are as follow.—First, That Shakspeare's share in that trilogy is not nicely ascertained, not so nicely as to warrant the founding upon it of any solemn accusation. Secondly, That M. Michelet forgot (or, which is far worse, not forgetting it, he dissembled) the fact that, in undertaking a series of dramas upon the basis avowedly of national chronicles, and for the very purpose of profiting by old traditional recollections connected with ancestral glories, it was mere lunacy to recast the circumstances at the bidding of antiquarian research, so as entirely to disturb these popular traditions. Besides that, to Shakspeare's age no such spirit of research had blossomed. Writing for the stage, a man would have risked lapidation by uttering a whisper in that direction. And, even if not, what sense could there have been in openly running counter to the very motive that had originally prompted that particular choice of chronicle plays? Thirdly, If one Englishman had, in a memorable situation, adopted the popular view of Joan's conduct (popular as much in France as in England), on the other hand, fifty years before M. Michelet was writing this flagrant injustice, another Englishman (viz Southey) had, in an epic poem, reversed this mis-judgment, and invested the shepherd girl with a glory nowhere else accorded to her,

That was the movement at work in the French Revolution. But the movement of Joanna d'Arc took a different direction. In her day also, it is true, the human heart had yearned after the same vast enfranchisement for the children of labour as afterwards worked in the great vision of the French Revolution. In her days also, and shortly before them, the human hand had sought by bloody acts to realize this dream of the heart. And in her childhood Joanna had not been insensible to these premature motions upon a path too bloody and too dark to be safe. But this view of human misery had been utterly absorbed to her by the special misery then desolating France. The lilies of France had been trampled under foot by the conquering stranger. Within fifty years, in three pitched battles that resounded to the ends of the earth, the chivalry of France had been exterminated. Her oriflamme had been dragged through the dust. The eldest son of Baptism had been prostrated. The daughter of France had been surrendered on coercion as a bride to her English conqueror. The child of that marriage, a marriage so ignominious to the land, was King of France by the consent of Christendom, that child's uncle domineered as regent of France, and that child's armies were in military possession of the land. But were they undisputed masters?

not even by Schiller. Fourthly, We are not entitled to view as an attack upon Joanna what, in the worst construction, is but an unexamining adoption of the contemporary historical accounts. A poet or a dramatist is not responsible for the accuracy of chronicles. But that which is an attack upon Joan, being briefly the foulest and obscenest attempt ever made to stifle the grandeur of a great human struggle,—viz the French burlesque poem of La Pucelle,—what memorable man was it that wrote that? Was he a Frenchman, or was he not? was his name Voltaire, Arouet de Voltaire, or was it not? That M. Michelet should pretend to have forgotten this vilest of pasquinades is more shocking to the general sense of justice than any special untruth as to Shakspeare can be to the particular nationality of an Englishman.

No ; and there precisely lay the sorrow of the time. Under a perfect conquest there would have been repose ; whereas the presence of the English armies did but furnish a plea, masking itself in patriotism, for gatherings everywhere of lawless marauders ; of soldiers that had deserted their banners, and of robbers by profession. This was the woe of France more even than the military dishonour. That dishonour had been palliated from the first by the genealogical pretensions of the English royal family to the French throne, and these pretensions were strengthened in the person of the present claimant. But the military desolation of France, this it was that woke the faith of Joanna in her heavenly mission of deliverance. It was the attitude of her prostrate country, crying night and day for purification from blood, and not from feudal oppression, that swallowed up the thoughts of the impassioned girl. But that was not the cry that uttered itself afterwards in the French Revolution. In Joanna's days, the first step towards rest for France was by expulsion of the foreigner. Independence of a foreign yoke, liberation as between people and people, was the one ransom to be paid for French honour and peace. That debt settled, there might come a time for thinking of civil liberties. But this time was not within the prospects of the poor shepherdess. The field, the area, of her sympathies never coincided with that of the revolutionary period. It followed, therefore, that Southey could not have raised Joanna (with her condition of feeling), by any management, into the interpreter of his own. That was the first error in his poem, and it was irremediable. The second was—and strangely enough this also escaped notice—that the heroine of Southey is made to close her career precisely at the point when its grandeur commences. She believed herself to have a mission for the deliverance of France ; and the great instrument which she was authorized to use towards this end was the king, Charles VII. Him she was to crown. With this coronation, her triumph, in the plain historical sense, ended. And there ends Southey's poem. But exactly at this point the grander stage of her mission commences, viz. the ransom which she, a solitary girl, paid in her own person for the national deliverance. The grander half of the story was thus sacrificed, as being irrelevant to Southey's political object; and yet, after all, the half which he retained did not at all symbolize that object. It is singular, indeed, to find a long poem, on an ancient subject, adapting itself hieroglyphically to a modern purpose; 2dly, to find it failing of this purpose; and, 3dly, if it had not failed, so planned that it could have succeeded only by a sacrifice of all that was grandest in the theme.

To these capital oversights Southey, Coleridge, and Lamb were all joint parties; the two first as concerned in the composition, the last as a frank though friendly reviewer of it in his private correspondence with Coleridge. It is, however, some palliation of these oversights, and a very singular fact in itself, that neither from English authorities nor from French, though the two nations were equally brought into close connexion with the career of that extraordinary girl, could any adequate view be obtained of her character and acts. The official records of her trial, apart from which nothing can be depended upon, were first in the course of publication from the Paris press during the currency of last<sup>1</sup> year. First in 1847, about four hundred and sixteen years after her ashes had been dispersed to the winds, could it be seen distinctly, through the clouds of fierce partisanship and national prejudices, what had been the frenzy of the persecution against her, and the utter desolation of her position; what had been the grandeur of her conscientious resistance.

Anxious that our readers should see Lamb from as many angles as possible, we have obtained from an old friend of his a memorial—slight, but such as the circumstances allowed—of an evening spent with Charles and Mary Lamb, in the winter of 1821-22. The record is of the most unambitious character; it pretends to nothing, as the reader will see, not so much as to a pun,—which it really required some singularity of luck to have missed from Charles Lamb, who often continued to fire puns, as minute guns, all through the evening. But, the more unpretending this record is, the more appropriate it becomes by that very fact to the memory of him who, amongst all authors, was the humblest and least pretending. We have often thought that the famous epitaph written for his own grave by Piron, the cynical author of La Métromanie, might have come from Lamb, were it not for one objection. Lamb's benign heart would have recoiled from a sarcasm, however effective, inscribed upon a grave-stone, or from a jest, however playful, that tended to a vindictive sneer amongst his own farewell words. We once translated this Piron epitaph into a kind of rambling Drayton couplet; and the only point needing explanation is that, from the accident of scientific men, Fellows of the Royal Society, being usually very solemn men, with an extra chance, therefore, for being, or for seeming, dull men in conversation, naturally it arose that some wit among our great-grandfathers translated F.R.S. into a short-hand expression for a Fellow Remarkably Stupid; to which version of the three letters our English epitaph alludes. The French original of Piron is this:—

<sup>1</sup> "Last year".—This was written in 1848.

“Ci git Piron, qui ne fut rien;
Pas même académicien.”

The bitter arrow of the second line was feathered to hit the French Académie, who had declined to elect him a member. The English version is this:—

“Here lies Piron; who was—nothing; or, if that could be, was less:
How!—nothing? Yes, nothing; not so much as F R.S.”

But now to our friend's memorandum<sup>1</sup>:—

October 6, 1848.

MY DEAR X.—You ask me for some memorial, however trivial, of any dinner party, supper party, water party, no matter what, that I can circumstantially recall to recollec-

<sup>1</sup> The memorandum, which begins here and extends to p. 254, and which professes to be a letter from a friend, is, as the reader will at once see, De Quincey's own. In an anonymous article to the North British Review he could hardly announce that it was De Quincey that was writing the article (though there have already been expressions from which any competent reader could have inferred that fact); and hence, when he wanted to insert into the article something of his own recollections of Lamb personally, he resorted to the device of a letter supposed to be sent by a friend for the use of the writer of the article.—M.

tion, by any features whatever, puns or repartees, wisdom or wit, connecting it with Charles Lamb. I grieve to say that my meetings of any sort with Lamb were few, though spread through a score of years. That sounds odd for one that loved Lamb so entirely, and so much venerated his character. But the reason was that I so seldom visited London, and Lamb so seldom quitted it. Somewhere about 1810 and 1812 I must have met Lamb repeatedly at the Courier Office in the Strand; that is, at Coleridge's, to whom, as an intimate friend, Mr. Daniel Stewart (a proprietor of the paper) gave up for a time the use of some rooms in the office. Thither, in the London season (May especially and June), resorted Lamb, Godwin, Sir H. Davy, and, once or twice, Wordsworth, who visited Sir George Beaumont's Leicestershire residence of Coleorton early in the spring, and then travelled up to Grosvenor Square with Sir George and Lady Beaumont, "spectatum veniens, veniens spectetur ut ipse."

But in these miscellaneous gatherings Lamb said little, except when an opening arose for a pun. And how effectual that sort of small shot was from him, I need not say to anybody who remembers his infirmity of stammering, and his dexterous management of it for purposes of light and shade. He was often able to train the roll of stammers into settling upon the words immediately preceding the effective one; by which means the key-note of the jest or sarcasm, benefiting by the sudden liberation of his embargoed voice, was delivered with the force of a pistol shot. That stammer was worth an annuity to him as an ally of his wit. Firing under cover of that advantage, he did triple execution: for, in the first place, the distressing sympathy of the hearers with his distress of utterance won for him unavoidably the silence of deep attention; and then, whilst he had us all hoaxed into this attitude of mute suspense by an appearance of distress that he perhaps did not really feel, down came a plunging shot into the very thick of us, with ten times the effect it would else have had. If his stammering, however, often did him true "yeoman's service," sometimes it led him into scrapes. Coleridge told me of a ludicrous embarrassment which it caused him at Hastings.

Lamb had been medically advised to a course of sea-bathing, and, accordingly, at the door of his bathing-machine, whilst he stood shivering with cold, two stout fellows laid hold of him, one at each shoulder, like heraldic supporters. They waited for the word of command from their principal, who began the following oration to them: "Hear me, men! Take notice of this—I am to be dipped. But—" What more he would have said is unknown to land or sea: for, having reached the word dipped, he commenced such a rolling fire of Di—di—di—di that, when at length he descended à plomb upon the full word dipped, the two men, tired of the long suspense, became satisfied that they reached what lawyers call the "operative clause" of the sentence, and, both exclaiming, "Oh yes, sir, we're quite aware of that," down they plunged him into the sea. On emerging, Lamb sobbed so much from the cold that he found no voice suitable to his indignation; from necessity he seemed tranquil; and, again addressing the men, who stood respectfully listening, he began thus: "Men! is it possible to obtain your attention?" "Oh, surely, sir, by all means." "Then listen: once more I tell you, I am to be di—di—di—," and then, with a burst of indignation, "dipped, I tell you." "Oh, decidedly, sir," rejoined the men, "decidedly," and down the stammerer went for the second time. Petrified with cold and wrath, for a third time Lamb made a feeble attempt at explanation—"Grant me pa—pa—patience; is it mun—um—murder you me—me—mean? Again and a—ga—ga—gain, I tell you, I am to be di—di—di—dipped," now speaking furiously, with the voice of an injured man. "Oh yes, sir," the men replied, "we know that, we fully understood it," and for the third time down went Lamb into the sea. "O limbs of Satan!" he said, on coming up for the third time; "it's now too late; I tell you that I am—no that I was—by medical direction—to be di—di—di—dipped only once."

Since the rencontres with Lamb at Coleridge's, I had met him once or twice at literary dinner-parties. One of these occurred at the house of Messrs. Taylor and Hessey, the publishers. I myself was suffering too much from illness at the time to take any pleasure in what passed, or to notice it with any vigilance of attention. Lamb, I remember, as usual, was full of gaiety ; and, as usual, he rose too rapidly to the zenith of his gaiety ; for he shot upwards like a rocket, and, as usual, people said he was "tipsy." To me, Lamb never seemed intoxicated, but at most joyously elevated. He never talked nonsense,—which is a great point gained ; nor polemically,—which is a greater, for it is a dreadful thing to find a drunken man bent upon converting one's-self ; nor sentimentally,—which is greatest of all. You can stand a man's fraternizing with you ; or, if he swears an eternal friendship only once in an hour, you do not think of calling the police ; but once in every three minutes is too much. Lamb did none of these things ; he was always rational, quiet, and gentlemanly in his habits. Nothing memorable, I am sure, passed upon this occasion, which was in November of 1821 ; and yet the dinner was memorable by means of one fact not discovered until some years later.

Amongst the company, all literary men, sat a murderer,—such he proved to be upon later discoveries, but even then looking prospectively towards that object,—and a murderer of a freezing class, cool, calculating, wholesale in his operations, and moving all along under the advantages of unsuspecting confidence and domestic opportunities. This was Mr. Wainwright, who was subsequently brought to trial, but not for any of his murders, and transported for life. The story has been told both by Judge Talfourd, and previously by Sir Edward B. Lytton. Both have been much blamed for the use made of this extraordinary case ; but I know not why. In itself it is a most remarkable case, for more reasons than one. It is remarkable for the appalling revelation which it makes of power spread through the hands of people not liable to suspicion, for purposes the most dreadful. It is remarkable also by the contrast which existed in this case between the murderer's dandy appearance and the terrific purposes with which he was always dallying. He was a contributor to a journal in which I also had written several papers.<sup>1</sup> This formed a shadowy link between us ; and, ill

<sup>1</sup> The journal mentioned is the London Magazine (see ante, Vol. III. pp. 5-8). De Quincey's own contributions to it at the time men-

as I was, I looked more attentively at him than at anybody else. Yet there were several men of wit and genius present,—amongst whom Lamb (as I have said) and Thomas Hood, Hamilton Reynolds and Allan Cunningham. But them I already knew, whereas Mr. W. I now saw for the first time and the last. What interested me about him was this. the papers which had been pointed out to me as his (signed Janus Weathercock or else Vinkbooms) were written in a spirit of coxcombry that did not so much disgust as amuse<sup>1</sup>. The writer could not conceal the ostentatious pleasure which he took in the luxurious fittings-up of his rooms, in the fancied splendour of his byouterie, &c. Yet it was easy for a man of any experience to read two facts in all this idle étalage. one being that his finery was but of a second-rate order; the other, that he was a parvenu, not at home even amongst his second-rate splendour. So far there was nothing to distinguish Mr. W's papers from the papers of other triflers. But in this point there was, viz. that in his judgments upon the great Italian masters of painting, Da Vinci, Titian, &c., there seemed a tone of sincerity and of native sensibility, as in one who spoke for himself, and was not merely a copier from books. This it was that interested me; as also his reviews of the chief Italian engravers, Morghen, Volpato, &c; not for the manner, which overflowed with levities and impertinence, but for the substance of his judgments in those cases where I happened to have had an opportunity of judging tioned (November 1821) had consisted only of his "Confessions of an English Opium-Eater," in two articles, in the two preceding months, but his subsequent contributions were to be numerous.—M.

<sup>1</sup> It is rather startling even now, in looking over the old volumes of the London Magazine from 1820 to 1824, to find in them, intermixed with the essays of Elia, and with papers by Hood, Hamilton Reynolds, Allan Cunningham, and De Quincey himself, the frequent, and indeed regularly recurring, contributions on art-subjects by this Janus Weathercock or Vinkbooms, alias Thomas Griffith Wainwright, the subsequently detected murderer. Among the contents of the very numbers in which De Quincey's "Confessions" appeared, and also Lamb's Essays entitled "The Old Benchers of the Inner Temple" and "Witches and Other Night Fears," one reads "C. VAN VINKBOOMS, HIS DOGMAS FOR DILETTANTI. No. I. Recollections in a Country Churchyard," and "C. VAN VINKBOOMS, HIS DOGMAS FOR DILETTANTI. No. II. Giulio Romano"—M for myself. Here arose also a claim upon Lamb's attention : for Lamb and his sister, having no sensibility for music, had the deepest for painting. Accordingly, Lamb paid him a great deal of attention, and continued to speak of him for years with an interest that seemed disproportioned to his pretensions. This might be owing in part to an indirect compliment to Miss Lamb in one of W's papers ; else his appearance would rather have repelled Lamb, it was commonplace, and better suited to express the dandyism which overspread the surface of his manner than the unaffected sensibility which apparently lay in his nature. Dandy or not, however, this man, on account of the schism in his papers,—so much amiable puppyism on one side, so much deep feeling on the other (feeling, applied to some of the grandest objects that earth has to show),—did really move a trifle of interest in me, on a day when I hated the face of man and woman. Yet again, if I had known this man for the murderer that even then he was, what sudden loss of interest, what sudden growth of another interest, would have changed the face of the scene ! Trivial creature, that didst carry thy dreadful eye kindling with perpetual treasons—dreadful creature, that didst carry thy trivial eye mantling with eternal levity,—over the sleeping surfaces of confiding household life,—oh, what a revolution for man wouldst thou have founded, had thy deep wickedness prospered ! What was that wickedness ? Here is its outline, but his murders were more than were ever made known judicially.

At this time (October 1848<sup>1</sup>) the whole British island is appalled by a new chapter in the history of poisoning. Locusta in ancient Rome, Madame Brinvilliers in Paris, were people of original genius : not in any new artifice of toxicology ; but in profiting by domestic openings for murder, unsuspected through their very atrocity. Such an opening was made some years ago by those who saw the possibility of founding purses for parents upon the murder of their children. This was done upon a larger scale than had been suspected, <sup>1</sup> This was written ten years ago ; and doubtless I had ground sufficient for what I then said. At present [1858], however, I have entirely forgotten the particular case alluded to, unless (as I rather believe) it was a case of infant funerals with a view to the insurance-money.

and upon a plausible pretence To bury a corpse is costly ; but, of a hundred children, only a few, in the ordinary course of mortality, will die within a given time. Five shillings apiece will produce £25 annually, and that will bury a considerable number. On this principle arose Infant Burial Societies. For a few shillings annually, a parent could secure a funeral for every child. If the child died, a few guineas fell due to the parent, and the funeral was accomplished without cost of his. But on this arose the suggestion—Why not execute an insurance of this nature twenty times over ? One single insurance pays for the funeral—the other nineteen are so much clear gain, a lucro ponatur, for the parents. Yes ; but on the supposition that the child dies ! Twenty are no better than one, unless they are gathered into the garner. Now, if the child died naturally, all was right ; but how if the child did not die ? Why, clearly this,—the child that can die, and won't die, may be made to die. There are many ways of doing that ; and it is shocking to know that, according to recent discoveries, poison is comparatively a very merciful mode of murder. Six years ago a dreadful communication was made to the public by a medical man, viz that three thousand children were annually burned to death under circumstances showing too clearly that they had been left by their mothers with the means and the temptations to set themselves on fire in her absence. But more shocking, because more lingering, are the deaths by artificial appliances of wet, cold, hunger, bad diet, and disturbed sleep, to the frail constitutions of children. By that machinery it is, and not by poison, that the majority qualify themselves for claiming the funeral allowances. Here, however, there occur to any man, on reflection, two eventual restraints on the extension of this domestic curse—1st, As there is no pretext for wanting more than one funeral on account of one child, any insurances beyond one are in themselves a ground of suspicion. Now, if any plan were devised for securing the publication of such insurances, the suspicions would travel as fast as the grounds for them. 2dly, It occurs that eventually the evil checks itself, since a society established on the ordinary rates of mortality would be ruined when a murderous stimulation was applied to that rate too extensively. Still it is certain that, for a season, this atrocity has prospered in manufacturing districts for some years, and more recently, as judicial investigations have shown, in one agricultural district of Essex.

Now, Mr. W.'s scheme of murder was, in its outline, the very same, but not applied to the narrow purpose of obtaining burials from a public fund. He persuaded, for instance, two beautiful young ladies, visitors in his family, and nearly related to his wife, to insure their lives for a short period of two years. This insurance was repeated in several different offices, until a sum of £18,000 had been secured in the event of their deaths within the two years. Mr. W. took care that they should die, and very suddenly, within that period. I never saw either of the young women myself; but I have been assured that one of them at least was memorably distinguished by her personal attractions. In the middle of the day which Mr. Wainwright had fixed for their murder, he framed a pretence for drawing his wife out of doors upon a very long walk. His fear was that she might have penetration enough to notice and report the agonizing spasms caused by the poison, whereas two young servant girls, totally inexperienced, were easily persuaded to believe it a case of cholera. On returning, after a three hours' walk, Mr. and Mrs. W. found the two young ladies dead. Having previously secured from his victims an assignment to himself of their claim, he endeavoured to make this assignment available. But the offices, which had vainly endeavoured to extract from the young ladies any satisfactory account of the reasons for this limited insurance, had their suspicions at last strongly roused. One office had recently experienced a case of the same nature, in which also the young lady had been poisoned by the man in whose behalf she had effected the insurance; all the offices declined to pay; actions at law arose; in the course of the investigation which followed, Mr W.'s character was fully exposed. Finally, in the midst of the embarrassments which ensued, he committed forgery, and was transported <sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> He was tried in 1836 on a charge of forgery, pleaded guilty; and was transported to Van Diemen's Land (now Tasmania); where he died in Hobart Town Hospital in 1852, or thereabouts.—M.

From this Mr. W, some few days afterwards, I received an invitation to a dinner party, expressed in terms that were obligingly earnest. He mentioned the names of his principal guests, and amongst them rested most upon those of Lamb and Sir David Wilkie. From an accident, I was unable to attend, and greatly regretted it. Sir David one might rarely happen to see, except at a crowded party. But, as regarded Lamb, I was sure to see him or to hear of him again in some way or other within a short time. This opportunity, in fact, offered itself within a month through the kindness of the Lambs themselves. They had heard of my being in solitary lodgings, and insisted on my coming to dine with them; which more than once I did in the winter of 1821-22

The mere reception by the Lambs was so full of goodness and hospitable feeling that it kindled animation in the most cheerless or torpid of invalids. I cannot imagine that any memorabilia occurred during the visit; but I will use the time that would else be lost upon the settling of that point in putting down any triviality that occurs to my recollection.

There were no strangers; Charles Lamb, his sister, and myself made up the party. Even this was done in kindness. They knew that I should have been oppressed by an effort such as must be made in the society of strangers; and they placed me by their own fireside, where I could say as much or as little as I pleased.

We dined about five o'clock; and it was one of the hospitalities inevitable to the Lambs that any game which they might receive from rural friends in the course of the week was reserved for the day of a friend's dining with them.

In regard to wine, Lamb and myself had the same habit—perhaps it rose to the dignity of a principle—viz. to take a great deal during dinner, none after it. Consequently, as Miss Lamb (who drank only water) retired almost with the dinner itself, nothing remained for men of our principles, the rigour of which we had illustrated by taking rather too much of old port before the cloth was drawn, except talking; amœbean colloquy, or, in Dr. Johnson's phrase, a dialogue of "brisk reciprocation." But this was impossible, over Lamb, at this period of his life, there passed regularly, after taking wine, a brief eclipse of sleep. It descended upon him as softly as a shadow. In a gross person, laden with superfluous flesh, and sleeping heavily, this would have been disagreeable ; but in Lamb, thin even to meagreness, spare and wiry as an Arab of the desert, or as Thomas Aquinas wasted by scholastic vigils, the affection of sleep seemed rather a network of aerial gossamer than of earthly cobweb—more like a golden haze falling upon him gently from the heavens than a cloud exhaling upwards from the flesh. Motionless in his chair as a bust, breathing so gently as scarcely to seem certainly alive, he presented the image of repose midway between life and death, like the repose of sculpture ; and, to one who knew his history, a repose affectingly contrasting with the calamities and internal storms of his life. I have heard more persons than I can now distinctly recall observe of Lamb, when sleeping, that his countenance in that state assumed an expression almost seraphic, from its intellectual beauty of outline, its child-like simplicity, and its benignity. It could not be called a transfiguration that sleep had worked in his face ; for the features wore essentially the same expression when waking ; but sleep spiritualized that expression, exalted it, and almost harmonized it. Much of the change lay in that last process. The eyes it was that disturbed the unity of effect in Lamb's waking face. They gave a restlessness to the character of his intellect, shifting, like northern lights, through every mode of combination with fantastic playfulness, and sometimes by fiery gleams obliterating for the moment that pure light of benignity which was the predominant reading on his features. Some people have supposed that Lamb had Jewish blood in his veins, which seemed to account for his gleaming eyes. It might be so ; but this notion found little countenance in Lamb's own way of treating the gloomy mediæval traditions propagated throughout Europe about the Jews, and their secret enmity to Christian races. Lamb, indeed, might not be more serious than Shakspeare is supposed to have been in his Shylock ; yet he spoke at times as from a station of wilful bigotry, and seemed (whether laughingly or not) to sympathize with the barbarous Christian superstitions upon the pretended bloody practices of the Jews, and of the early Jewish physicians. Being himself a Lincoln man, he treated Sir Hugh of Lincoln,<sup>1</sup> the young child that suffered death by secret assassination in the Jewish quarter rather than suppress his daily anthems to the Virgin, as a true historical personage on the rolls of martyrdom; careless that this fable, like that of the apprentice murdered out of jealousy by his master the architect, had destroyed its own authority by ubiquitous diffusion. All over Europe the same legend of the murdered apprentice and the martyred child reappears under different names—so that in effect the verification of the tale is none at all, because it is unanimous; is too narrow, because it is too impossibly broad. Lamb, however, though it was often hard to say whether he were not secretly laughing, swore to the truth of all these old fables, and treated the liberalities of the present generation on such points as mere fantastic and effeminate affectations,—which, no doubt, they often are as regards the sincerity of those who profess them. The bigotry which it pleased his fancy to assume he used like a sword against the Jew, as the official weapon of the Christian, upon the same principle that a Capulet would have drawn upon a Montague, without conceiving it any duty of his to rip up the grounds of so ancient a quarrel; it was a feud handed down to him by his ancestors, and it was their business to see that originally it had been an honest feud. I cannot yet believe that Lamb, if seriously aware of any family interconnexion with Jewish blood, would, even in jest, have held that one-sided language. More probable it is that the fiery eye recorded not any alliance with Jewish blood, but that disastrous alliance with insanity which tainted his own life, and laid desolate his sister's.

The mercurialities of Lamb were infinite, and always uttered in a spirit of absolute recklessness for the quality or the prosperity of the sally. It seemed to liberate his spirits from some burthen of blackest melancholy which oppressed it, when he had thrown off a jest: he would not stop one instant to improve it; nor did he care the value of a straw whether it were good enough to be remembered, or so mediocre as to extort high moral indignation from a collector who refused to receive into his collection of jests and puns any that were not felicitously good or revoltingly bad.

<sup>1</sup> The story which furnishes a basis to the fine ballad in Percy's Reliques, and to the Canterbury Tale of Chaucer's Lady Abbess.

After tea, Lamb read to me a number of beautiful compositions, which he had himself taken the trouble to copy out into a blank paper folio, from unsuccessful authors. Neglected people in every class won the sympathy of Lamb. One of the poems, I remember, was a very beautiful sonnet from a volume recently published by Lord Thurlow—which, and Lamb's just remarks upon which, I could almost repeat verbatim at this moment, nearly twenty-seven years later, if your limits would allow me. But these, you tell me, allow of no such thing; at the utmost they allow only twelve lines more. Now all the world knows that the sonnet itself would require fourteen lines; but take fourteen from twelve and there remains very little, I fear; besides which, I am afraid two of my twelve are already exhausted. This forces me to interrupt my account of Lamb's reading, or reporting the very accident that did interrupt it in fact; since that no less characteristically expressed Lamb's peculiar spirit of kindness (always quickening itself towards the ill-used or the down-trodden) than it had previously expressed itself in his choice of obscure readings. Two ladies came in, one of whom at least had sunk in the scale of worldly consideration. They were ladies who would not have found much recreation in literary discussions,—elderly, and habitually depressed. On their account, Lamb proposed whist; and in that kind effort to amuse them,—which naturally drew forth some momentary gaieties from himself, but not of a kind to impress themselves on the recollection,—the evening terminated.

Of Lamb's writings, some were confessedly failures, and some were so memorably beautiful as to be uniques in their class. The character of Lamb it is, and the life-struggle of Lamb, that must fix the attention of many, even amongst those wanting in sensibility to his intellectual merits. This character and this struggle, as we have already observed, impress many traces of themselves upon Lamb's writings. Even in that view, therefore, they have a ministerial value;

but separately, for themselves, they have an independent value of the highest order. Upon this point we gladly adopt the eloquent words of Sergeant Talfourd —

“The sweetness of Lamb’s character, breathed through his writings, was felt even by strangers; but its heroic aspect was unguessed even by many of his friends. Let them now consider it, and ask if the annals of self-sacrifice can show anything in human action and endurance more lovely than its self-devotion exhibits? It was not merely that he saw, through the ensanguined cloud of misfortune which had fallen upon his family, the unstained excellence of his sister, whose madness had caused it; that he was ready to take her to his own home with reverential affection, and cherish her through life, and gave up, for her sake, all meaner and more selfish love, and all the hopes which youth blends with the passion which disturbs and ennobles it; not even that he did all this cheerfully, without pluming himself upon his brotherly nobleness as a virtue, or seeking to repay himself (as some uneasy martyrs do) by small instalments of long repining; but that he carried the spirit of the hour in which he first knew and took his course to his last. So far from thinking that his sacrifice of youth and love to his sister gave him a licence to follow his own caprice at the expense of her feelings, even in the lightest matters, he always wrote and spoke of her as his wiser self, his generous benefactress, of whose protecting care he was scarcely worthy”

It must be remembered also (which the Sergeant does not overlook) that Lamb’s efforts for the becoming support of his sister lasted through a period of forty years. Twelve years before his death, the munificence of the India House, by granting him a liberal retiring allowance, had placed his own support under shelter from accidents of any kind. But this died with himself, and he could not venture to suppose that, in the event of his own death, the India House would grant to his sister the same allowance as by custom is granted to a wife. This, however, they did; but Lamb, not venturing to calculate upon such nobility of patronage, had applied himself through life to the saving of a provision for his sister under any accident to himself. And this he did with a persevering prudence but little known in the literary class, amongst a continued tenor of generousities, often so princely as to be scarcely known in any class.

Was this man, so memorably good by life-long sacrifice of himself, in any profound sense a Christian? The impression is that he was not. We, from private communications with him, can undertake to say that, according to his knowledge and opportunities for the study of Christianity, he was. What has injured Lamb on this point is that his early opinions (which, however, from the first were united with the deepest piety) are read by the inattentive as if they had been the opinions of his mature days; secondly, that he had few religious persons amongst his friends,—which made him reserved in the expression of his own views; thirdly, that, in any case where he altered opinions for the better, the credit of the improvement is assigned to Coleridge. Lamb, for example, beginning life as a Unitarian, in not many years became a Trinitarian. Coleridge passed through the same changes in the same order; and here, at least, Lamb is supposed simply to have obeyed the influence, confessedly great, of Coleridge. This, on our own knowledge of Lamb's views, we pronounce to be an error. And the following extracts from Lamb's letters will show not only that he was religiously disposed on impulses self-derived, but that, so far from obeying the bias of Coleridge, he ventured, on this one subject, firmly as regarded the matter, though humbly as regarded the manner, affectionately to reprove Coleridge.

In a letter to Coleridge, written in 1797, the year after his sister's first attack of lunacy, he says:—"Coleridge, I have not one truly elevated character among my acquaintance; not one Christian; not one but undervalues Christianity. Singly, what am I to do? Wesley—(have you read his life?)—was not he an elevated character? Wesley has said religion was not a solitary thing. Alas! it is necessarily so with me, or next to solitary. 'Tis true you write to me; but correspondence by letter and personal intimacy are widely different. Do, do write to me; and do some good to my mind—already how much 'warped and relaxed' by the world!"

In a letter written about three months previously, he had not scrupled to blame Coleridge at some length for audacities of religious speculation which seemed to him at war with the simplicities of pure religion. He says:—"Do continue to write to me. I read your letters with my sister, and they give us both abundance of delight. Especially they please us two when you talk in a religious strain. Not but we are offended occasionally with a certain freedom of expression, a certain air of mysticism, more consonant to the conceits of pagan philosophy than consistent with the humility of genuine piety."—Then, after some instances of what he blames, he says:—"Be not angry with me, Coleridge. I wish not to cavil; I know I cannot instruct you; I only wish to remind you of that humility which best becometh the Christian character. God, in the New Testament, our best guide, is represented to us in the kind, condescending, amiable, familiar light of a parent; and, in my poor mind, 'tis best for us so to consider him as our heavenly Father, and our best friend, without indulging too bold conceptions of his character"—About a month later, he says.—"Few but laugh at me for reading my Testament. They talk a language I understand not; I conceal sentiments that would be a puzzle to them."

We see by this last quotation where it was that Lamb originally sought for consolation. We personally can vouch that, at a maturer period, when he was approaching his fiftieth year, no change had affected his opinions upon that point; and, on the other hand, that no changes had occurred in his needs for consolation, we see, alas! in the records of his life. We do not undertake to say that in his knowledge of Christianity he was everywhere profound or consistent; but he was always earnest in his aspirations after its spiritualities, and had an apprehensive sense of its power.

Charles Lamb is gone. His life was a continued struggle in the service of love the purest, and within a sphere visited by little of contemporary applause. Even his intellectual displays won but a narrow sympathy at any time, and in his earlier period were saluted with positive derision and contumely on the few occasions when they were not oppressed by entire neglect. But slowly all things right themselves. All merit which is founded in truth, and is strong enough, reaches by sweet exhalations in the end a higher sensory ; reaches higher organs of discernment, lodged in a selecter audience. But the original obtuseness or vulgarity of feeling that thwarted all just estimation of Lamb in life will continue to thwart its popular diffusion. There are even some that continue to regard him with the old hostility, and the old unmitigated scorn. And we, therefore, standing by the side of Lamb's grave, seemed to hear, on one side (but in abated tones), strains of the ancient malice—"This man, that thought himself to be somebody, is dead, is buried, is forgotten!" and, on the other side, seemed to hear ascending as with the solemnity of a saintly requiem—"This man, that thought himself to be nobody, is dead, is buried ; his life has been searched ; and his memory is hallowed for ever !"

PROFESSOR WILSON

SKETCH IN 1829<sup>1</sup>

MY DEAR L,—Among the lions whom you missed by one accident or another on your late travels in Europe, I observe that you recur to none with so much regret as Professor Wilson. You dwell upon this one disappointment as a per-

<sup>1</sup> On the 16th of May 1829, when De Quincey had virtually settled in Edinburgh (though still going and coming between Edinburgh and his cottage at Grasmere), there was published the first number of a weekly periodical called the Edinburgh Literary Gazette. Though tastefully conducted and edited, it did not last much beyond a year (the last number I have seen bearing the date "Saturday, July 10, 1830"): a fate not wonderful when the price per number of 16 quarto pages was "8d. unstamped," with 4d. extra for stamped copies to go free by post. Not two years later, ie in February 1832, when Chambers's Edinburgh Journal was started, it was at the price of 1½d. per number; which made a difference, and may partly account for the fact that, after nearly sixty years, that first British pioneer of cheap literature still exists and flourishes. The short-lived Edinburgh Literary Gazette of 1829-30 did, nevertheless, attract local talent and win some reputation. De Quincey, though Blackwood was then his mainstay, had some connexion with this humbler Edinburgh weekly. A contribution of his, entitled "Sketch of Professor Wilson: in a Letter to an American Gentleman," spread over three numbers—beginning in that for June 6, 1829 (the fourth number of the periodical), and continued in the numbers for June 20 and July 11. Of three separate sketches which De Quincey has left us of his friend Wilson, this is distinctly the best. Extracts, I believe, have been made from it here and there, but, so far as I know, it has never hitherto been reprinted entire anywhere else than in the American Riverside Edition of De Quincey's Works. In the present reprint the epistolary form of the original has been preserved.—M.

sonal misfortune; and perhaps with reason; for, in the course of my life, I have met with no man of equally varied accomplishments, or, upon the whole, so well entitled to be ranked with that order of men, distinguished by brilliant versatility and ambidexterity, of which we find such eminent models in Alcibiades, in Cæsar, in Crichton, in that of Servan recorded by Sully, and in one or two Italians. Pity that you had not earlier communicated to me the exact route you were bound to, and the particular succession of your engagements when you visited the English Lakes; since, in that case, my interest with Professor Wilson (supposing always that you had declined to rely upon the better passport of your own merits as a naturalist) would have availed for a greater thing than at that time stood between you and the introduction which you coveted. On the day, or the night rather, when you were at Bowness and Ambleside, I happen to know that Professor Wilson's business was one which might have been executed by proxy, though it could not be delayed; and I also know that, apart from the general courtesy of his nature, he would, at all times, have an especial pleasure in waiving a claim of business for one of science or letters, in the person of a foreigner coming from a great distance; and that in no other instance would he make such a sacrifice so cordially as on behalf of an able naturalist. Perhaps you already know from your countryman Audubon that the Professor is himself a naturalist, and of original merit; in fact, worth a score of such meagre bookish naturalists as are formed in museums and by second-hand acts of memory; having (like Audubon) built much of his knowledge upon personal observation. Hence he has two great advantages. one, that his knowledge is accurate in a very unusual degree; and another, that this knowledge, having grown up under the inspiration of a real interest and an unaffected love for its objects,—commencing, indeed, at an age when no affectation in matters of that nature could exist,—has settled upon those facts and circumstances which have a true philosophical value. Habits, predominant affections, the direction of instincts, and the compensatory processes where these happen to be thwarted,—on all such topics he is learned and full; whilst on the science of measurements and proportions applied to dorsal-fins and tail feathers, and on the exact arrangement of colours, &c.,—that petty upholstery of nature on which books are so tedious and elaborate,—not uncommonly he is negligent or forgetful. What may have served in later years to quicken and stimulate his knowledge in this field, and, at any rate, greatly to extend it, is the conversation of his youngest brother, Mr James Wilson, who (as you know much better than I) is a naturalist mayorum gentium.<sup>1</sup> He, indeed, whilst a boy of not more than sixteen or seventeen, was in correspondence (I believe) with Montague the Ornithologist, and about the same time had skill enough to pick holes in the coat of Mr Huber, the German reformer of our then erroneous science of bees.

You see, therefore, that no possible introduction could have stood you more in stead than your own extensive knowledge of transatlantic ornithology. Swammerdam passed his life, it is said, in a ditch. That was a base, earthy solitude,—and a prison. But you and Audubon have passed your lives in the heavenly solitudes of forests and savannahs, and such solitude as this is no prison, but infinite liberty. The knowledge which you have gathered has been answerable to the character of your school; and no sort of knowledge could have secured you a better welcome with Professor Wilson. Yet, had it been otherwise, I repeat that my interest (as I flatter myself) would have opened the gates of Elleray to you even at midnight; for I am so old a friend of Mr. Wilson that I take a pride in supposing myself the oldest, and, barring relations by blood, arrogate the rights of dean in the chapter of his associates,—or at least I know of but one person whose title can probably date earlier than mine. About this very month when I am writing, I have known Professor Wilson for a cycle of twenty years and more; which is just half of his life, and also half of mine; for we are almost ad apicem of the same age: Wilson being born in May, and I in August, of the same memorable year.

My introduction to him, setting apart the introducee

<sup>1</sup> Author of Illustrations of Zoology (1826-32), Entomologia Edinensis (1834), and Voyage round the Coasts of Scotland (1842).—M.

himself, was memorable from one sole circumstance: viz. the person of the introducer. William Wordsworth it was who in the vale of Grasmere, if it can interest you to know the place, and in the latter end of 1808, if you can be supposed to care about the time, did me the favour of making me known to John Wilson, or, as I might say (upon the Scottish fashion of designating men from their territorial pretensions), to Elleray. I remember the whole scene as circumstantially as if it belonged to but yesterday. In the vale of Grasmere,—that peerless little vale which you and Gray the poet and so many others have joined in admiring as the very Eden of English beauty, peace, and pastoral solitude,—you may possibly recall, even from that flying glimpse you had of it, a modern house called Allan Bank, standing under a low screen of woody rocks which descend from the hill of Silver How, on the western side of the lake. This house had been then recently built by a worthy merchant of Liverpool, but for some reason, of no importance to you and me, not being immediately wanted for the family of the owner, had been let for a term of three years to Mr. Wordsworth. At the time I speak of, both Mr. Coleridge and myself were on a visit to Mr. Wordsworth; and one room on the ground-floor, designed for a breakfasting-room, which commands a sublime view of the three mountains,—Fairfield, Arthur's Chair, and Seat Sandal (the first of them within about four hundred feet of the highest mountains in Great Britain),—was then occupied by Mr. Coleridge as a study. On this particular day, the sun having only just set, it naturally happened that Mr. Coleridge—whose nightly vigils were long—had not yet come down to breakfast. meantime, and until the epoch of the Coleridgean breakfast should arrive, his study was lawfully disposable to profaner uses. Here, therefore, it was, that, opening the door hastily in quest of a book, I found seated, and in earnest conversation, two gentlemen,—one of them my host, Mr. Wordsworth, at that time about thirty-seven or thirty-eight years old. The other was a younger man by good sixteen or seventeen years, in a sailor's dress, manifestly in robust health—fervidus juvenis, and wearing upon his countenance a powerful expression of ardour and animated intelligence, mixed with much good nature. "Mr. Wilson of Elleray"—delivered, as the formula of introduction, in the deep tones of Mr Wordsworth—at once banished the momentary surprise I felt on finding an unknown stranger where I had expected nobody, and substituted a surprise of another kind. I now well understood who it was that I saw ; and there was no wonder in his being at Allan Bank, Elleray standing within nine miles ; but (as usually happens in such cases) I felt a shock of surprise on seeing a person so little corresponding to the one I had half unconsciously prefigured.

And here comes the place naturally, if anywhere, for a description of Mr. Wilson's person and general appearance in carriage, manner, and deportment, and a word or two I shall certainly say on these points, simply because I know that I must, else my American friends will complain that I have left out that precise section in my whole account which it is most impossible for them to supply for themselves by any acquaintance with his printed works. Yet suffer me, before I comply with this demand, to enter one word of private protest against the childish (nay, worse than childish—the missy) spirit in which such demands originate. From my very earliest years,—that is the earliest years in which I had any sense of what belongs to true dignity of mind,—I declare to you that I have considered the interest which men, grown men, take in the personal appearance of each other as one of the meanest aspects under which human curiosity commonly presents itself. Certainly I have the same intellectual perception of differences in such things that other men have ; but I connect none of the feelings, whether of admiration or contempt, liking or disliking, which are obviously connected with these perceptions by human beings generally. Such words as "commanding appearance," "prepossessing countenance," applied to the figures or faces of the males of the human species, have no meaning in my ears. no man commands me, no man prepossesses me, by anything in, on, or about his carcass. What care I for any man's legs ? I laugh at his ridiculous presumption in conceiting that I shall trouble myself to admire or to respect anything that he can produce in his physics. What ! shall I honour Milo for the very qualities which he has in common with the beastly ox he carries—his thews and sinews, his ponderous strength and weight, and the quantity of thumping that his hide will carry? I disclaim and disdain any participation in such green-girl feelings. I admit that the baby feelings I am here condemning are found in connexion with the highest intellects: in particular, Mr. Coleridge, for instance, once said to me, as a justifying reason for his dislike of a certain celebrated Scotsman, with an air of infinite disgust, that—“ugh”! (making a guttural sound as if of execration) “he (viz. the said Scotsman) was so chicken-breasted.” I have been assured, by the way, that Mr. Coleridge was mistaken in the mere matter of fact: but, supposing that he were not, what a reason for a philosopher to build a disgust upon! And Mr. Wordsworth, in or about the year 1820, in expressing the extremity of his Nil admirari spirit, declared that he would not go ten yards out of his road to see the finest specimen of man (intellectually speaking) that Europe had to show and so far indeed I do not quarrel with his opinion; but Mr. Wordsworth went on to say that this indifference did not extend itself to man considered physically, and that he would still exert himself to a small extent (suppose a mile or so) for the sake of seeing Belzoni. That was the case he instanced; and, as I understood him, not by way of a general illustration for his meaning, but that he really felt an exclusive interest in this particular man’s physics. Now, Belzoni was certainly a good tumbler, as I have heard, and hopped well upon one leg, when surmounted and crested by a pyramid of men and boys; and jumped capitally through a hoop; and did all sorts of tricks in all sorts of styles, not at all worse than any monkey, bear, or learned pig, that ever exhibited in Great Britain. And I would myself have given a shilling to have seen him fight with that cursed Turk that assaulted him in the streets of Cairo, and would have given him a crown for catching the circumcised dog by the throat and effectually taking the conceit out of his Mahometan carcass. But then that would have been for the spectacle of the passions which, in such a case, would have been let loose: as to the mere animal Belzoni,—who after all was not to be compared to Topham the Warwickshire man, that drew back by main force a cart, and its driver, and a strong horse,—as to the mere animal Belzoni, I say, and his bull neck, I would have much preferred to see a real bull, or the Darlington ox. The sum of the matter is this —All men, even those who are most manly in their style of thinking and feeling, in many things retain the childishness of their childish years : no man thoroughly weeds himself of all. And this particular mode of childishness is one of the commonest, into which they fall the more readily from the force of sympathy, and because they apprehend no reason for directing any vigilance against it. But I contend that reasonably no feelings of deep interest are justifiable as applied to any point of external form or feature in human beings, unless under two reservations. First, that they shall have reference to women ; because women, being lawfully the objects of passions and tender affections which can have no existence as applied to men, are objects also, rationally and consistently, of all other secondary feelings (such as those derived from their personal appearance) which have any tendency to promote and support the first ; whereas between men the highest mode of intercourse is merely intellectual,—which is not of a nature to receive support or strength from any feelings of pleasure or disgust connected with the accidents of external appearance, but, exactly in the degree in which these have any influence at all, they must warp and disturb by improper biases. And the single case of exception, where such feelings can be honourable and laudable amongst the males of the human species, is where they regard such deformities as are the known products and expressions of criminal or degrading propensities. All beyond this, I care not by whom countenanced, is infirmity of mind, and would be baseness if it were not excused by imbecility.

Excuse this digression, for which I have a double reason. Chiefly I was anxious to put on record my own opinions, and my contempt for men generally in this particular ; and here I seemed to have a conspicuous situation for that purpose. Secondly, apart from this purpose of offence, I was at any rate anxious, merely on a defensive principle, to screen myself from the obvious misinterpretation incident to the case. Saying anything minute or in detail upon a man's person, I should necessarily be supposed to do so under the ordinary blind feelings of interest in that subject which govern most people ; feelings which I disdain. Now, having said all this, and made my formal protest, liberavi animam meam, and I revert to my subject, and shall say that word or two which I was obliged to promise you on Professor Wilson's personal appearance.

Figure to yourself, then, a tall man, about six feet high, within half an inch or so, built with tolerable appearance of strength, but at the date of my description (that is, in the very spring-tide and blossom of youth) wearing, for the predominant character of his person, lightness and agility, or (in our Westmoreland phrase) lighthness. He seemed framed with an express view to gymnastic exercises of every sort—

Ἄλμα, ποδωκείην, δίσκον, ἄκοντα, πάλην.

In the first of these exercises, indeed, and possibly (but of that I am not equally certain) in the second, I afterwards came to know that he was absolutely unrivalled ; and the best leapers at that time in the ring, Richmond the Black and others, on getting "a taste of his quality," under circumstances of considerable disadvantage (viz. after a walk from Oxford to Moulsey Hurst, which I believe is fifty miles), declined to undertake him. For this exercise he had two remarkable advantages. It is recorded of Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, that, though otherwise a handsome man, he offended the connoisseurs in statuesque proportions by one eminent defect—perhaps the most obtrusive to which the human figure is liable—viz. a body of length disproportioned to his legs. In Mr. Wilson the proportions were fortunately reversed : a short trunk, and remarkably long legs, gave him one half of his advantages in the noble science of leaping. The other half was afterwards pointed out to me by an accurate critic in these matters as lying in the particular conformation of his foot, the instep of which is arched, and the back of the heel strengthened, in so remarkable a way that it would be worth paying a penny or so for a sight of them. It is really laughable to think of the coxcomby which eminent men of letters have displayed in connexion with their powers—real or fancied—in this art. Cardinal du Perron vapoured to the end of his life upon some remarkable leap that he either had accomplished, or conceived himself to have accomplished (not, I presume, in red stockings). Every tenth page of the Perroniana rings with the echo of this stupendous leap—the length of which, if I remember rightly, is as obviously fabulous as any feat of Don Belamis of Greece. Des Cartes also had a lurking conceit that, in some unknown place, he had perpetrated a leap that ought to immortalise him ; and in one of his letters he repeats and accredits a story of some obscure person's leap, which of reasonable credulity. Many other eminent leapers might be cited, Pagan and Christian : but the Cardinal, by his own account, appears to have been the flower of Popish leapers ; and, with all deference to his Eminence, upon a better assurance than that, Professor Wilson may be rated, at the time I speak of, as the flower of all Protestant leapers. Not having the Cardinal's foible of connecting any vanity with this little accomplishment, knowing exactly what could and what could not be effected in this department of gymnastics, and speaking with the utmost simplicity and candour of his failures and his successes alike, he might always be relied upon, and his statements were constantly in harmony with any collateral testimony that chance happened to turn up.

“ At one light bound high overleaped all bound ”

Viewed, therefore, by an eye learned in gymnastic proportions, Mr. Wilson presented a somewhat striking figure : and by some people he was pronounced with emphasis a fine-looking young man ; but others, who less understood, or less valued these advantages, spoke of him as nothing extraordinary. Still greater division of voices I have heard on his pretensions to be thought handsome. In my opinion, and most certainly in his own, these pretensions were but slender. His complexion was too florid, hair of a hue quite unsuited to that complexion ; eyes not good, having no apparent depth, but seeming mere surfaces ; and, in fine, no one feature that could be called fine, except the lower region of his face, mouth, chin, and the parts adjacent, which were then (and perhaps are now) truly elegant and Ciceronian. Ask in one of your public libraries for that little 4to edition of the Rhetorical Works of Cicero, edited by Schutz (the same who edited Æschylus), and you will there see (as a frontispiece to the 1st vol.) a reduced whole length of Cicero from the antique, which, in the mouth and chin, and indeed generally, if I do not greatly forget, will give you a lively representation of the contour and expression of Professor Wilson's face. Taken as a whole, though not handsome (as I have already said) when viewed in a quiescent state, the head and countenance are massy, dignified, and expressive of tranquil sagacity.

Thus far of Professor Wilson in his outward man, whom (to gratify you and yours, and upon the consideration that my letter is to cross the Atlantic) I have described with an effort and a circumstantiation that are truly terrific to look back upon. And now, returning to the course of my narrative, such in personal appearance was the young man upon whom my eyes suddenly rested, for the first time, upwards of twenty years ago, in the study of S. T. Coleridge — looking, as I said before, light as a Mercury to eyes familiar with the British build; but, with reference to the lengthy model of you Yankees, who spindle up so tall and narrow, already rather bulky and columnar. Note, however, that of all this array of personal features, as I have here described them, I then saw nothing at all, my attention being altogether occupied with Mr. Wilson's conversation and demeanour, which were in the highest degree agreeable — the points which chiefly struck me being the humility and gravity with which he spoke of himself, his large expansion of heart, and a certain air of noble frankness which overspread everything he said. He seemed to have an intense enjoyment of life; indeed, being young, rich, healthy, and full of intellectual activity, it could not be very wonderful that he should feel happy and pleased with himself and others; but it was somewhat unusual to find that so rare an assemblage of endowments had communicated no tinge of arrogance to his manner, or at all disturbed the general temperance of his mind.

Turn we now suddenly, and without preparation, — simply by way of illustrating the versatile humour of the man, — from this grave and (as in reality it was) philosophic scene, to another first introduction, under most different circumstances, to the same Mr. Wilson. Represent to yourself the earliest dawn of a fine summer morning, time about half-past two o'clock. A young man, anxious for an introduction to Mr. Wilson, and as yet pretty nearly a stranger to the country, has taken up his abode in Grasmere, and has strolled out at this early hour to that rocky and moorish common (called the White Moss) which overhangs the Vale of Rydal, dividing it from Grasmere. Looking southwards in the direction of Rydal, suddenly he becomes aware of a huge beast advancing at a long trot, with the heavy and thundering tread of a hippopotamus, along the public road. The creature is soon arrived within half-a-mile of his station, and by the gray light of morning is at length made out to be a bull, apparently flying from some unseen enemy in his rear. As yet, however, all is mystery; but suddenly three horsemen double a turn in the road, and come flying into sight with the speed of a hurricane, manifestly in pursuit of the fugitive bull. The bull labours to navigate his huge bulk to the moor, which he reaches, and then pauses, panting and blowing out clouds of smoke from his nostrils, to look back from his station amongst rocks and slippery crags upon his hunters. If he had conceived that the rockiness of the ground had secured his repose, the foolish bull is soon undeceived. The horsemen, scarcely relaxing their speed, charge up the hill, and, speedily gaining the rear of the bull, drive him at a gallop over the worst part of that impracticable ground down into the level ground below. At this point of time the stranger perceives by the increasing light of the morning that the hunters are armed with immense spears fourteen feet long. With these the bull is soon dislodged; and, scouring down to the plain below, he and the hunters at his tail take to the common at the head of the lake, and all, in the madness of the chase, are soon half engulfed in the swamps of the morass. After plunging together for ten or fifteen minutes, all suddenly regain the terra firma, and the bull again makes for the rocks. Up to this moment there had been the silence of ghosts; and the stranger had doubted whether the spectacle were not a pageant of aerial spectres, ghostly huntsmen, ghostly lances, and a ghostly bull. But just at this crisis a voice (it was the voice of Mr. Wilson) shouted aloud, "Turn the villain; turn that villain; or he will take to Cumberland." The young stranger did the service required of him; the villain was turned and fled southwards; the hunters, lance in rest, rushed after him; all bowed their thanks as they fled past; the fleet cavalcade again took the high road, they doubled the cape which shut them out of sight; and in a moment all had disappeared and left the quiet valley to its original silence, whilst the young stranger and two grave Westmoreland statesmen (who by this time had come into sight upon some accident or other) stood wondering in silence, and saying to themselves perhaps,— "The earth hath bubbles as the water hath;

And these are of them!"

But they were no bubbles. The bull was a substantial bull, and took no harm at all from being turned out occasionally at midnight for a chase of fifteen or eighteen miles. The bull, no doubt, used to wonder at this nightly visitation; and the owner of the bull must sometimes have pondered a little on the draggled state in which the swamps would now and then leave his beast; but no other harm came of it. And so it happened, and in the very hurly-burly of such an unheard-of chase, that my friend was fortunate enough, by a little service, to recommend himself to the notice of Mr Wilson; and so passed the scene of his first introduction<sup>1</sup>

In reading the anecdote of the bull-hunt, you must bear in mind the period of Mr. Wilson's life to which it belongs; else I should here be unintentionally adding one more to the thousand misrepresentations of his character which are already extant in different repositories of scandal: most of which I presume, unless in the rarer cases where they have been the pure creations of malice, owe their origin to a little exaggeration, and a great deal of confusion in dates. Levities and extravagances, which find a ready excuse at twenty, ten or fifteen years later are fatal to a man's character for good sense. In such a case, therefore, to be careless or inaccurate in dates, is a moral dishonesty. Understand then that the bull-hunting scenes belong to the time which immediately succeeded my first knowledge of Mr. Wilson. This particular frolic happened to fall within the earliest period of my own personal acquaintance with him. Else, and with this one exception, the era of his wildest (and, according to the common estimate, of his insane) extravagances was already past. All those stories, therefore, which you question me about with so much curiosity,—of his having joined a company of strolling players, and himself taken the leading parts both in Tragedy and Comedy,—of his having assumed the garb of a Gypsy, and settled for some time in a Gypsy encampment, out of admiration for a young Egyptian beauty,—with fifty others of the same class,—belong undoubtedly (as many of them as are not wholly fabulous) to the four years immediately preceding the time at which my personal knowledge of Mr. Wilson commenced.

<sup>1</sup> The first portion of the paper ended here.—M.

From the latter end of 1803 to the spring of 1808, Mr. Wilson had studied at the University of Oxford; and it was within that period that most of his escapades were crowded. He had previously studied as a mere boy, according to the Scotch fashion, at the University of Glasgow, chiefly under the tuition of the late Mr. Jardine (the Professor, I believe, of Logic) and Dr. or Mr. Young (the Professor of Greek). At both Universities he had greatly distinguished himself; but at Oxford, where the distribution of prizes and honours of every kind is to the last degree parsimonious and select, naturally it follows that such academical distinctions are really significant distinctions, and proclaim an unequivocal merit in him who has carried them off from a crowd of 1600 or 2000 co-rivals to whom the contest was open; whereas in the Scotch Universities, as I am told by Scotchmen, the multiplication of prizes and medals, and the almost indiscriminate profusion with which they are showered abroad, neutralize their whole effect and value. At least this was the case in Mr. Wilson's time; but lately some conspicuous changes have been introduced by a Royal Commission (not yet, I believe, dissolved) into one at least of the Scotch Universities, which have greatly improved it in this respect, by bringing it much nearer to the English model. When Mr. Wilson gained a prize of fifty guineas for fifty lines of

English verse, without further inquiry it becomes evident from the mere rarity of the distinction,—which, for a university now nearly of five thousand members, occurs but once a year,—and from the great over-proportion of that peculiar class (the Undergraduates) to whom the contest is open,—that such a victory was an indisputable criterion of very conspicuous merit. In fact, never in any place did Mr. Wilson play off his Proteus variety of character and talent with so much brilliant effect as at Oxford. In this great University, the most ancient, and by many degrees the most magnificent in the world, he found a stage for display perfectly congenial with the native elevation of his own character. Perhaps you are not fully aware of the characteristic differences which separate our two English Universities of Oxford and Cambridge from those of Scotland and the Continent · for I have always observed that the best informed foreigners, even after a week's personal acquaintance with the Oxford system, still adhere to the inveterate preconceptions which they had brought with them from the Continent. For instance, they continue obstinately to speak of the Professors as the persons to whom the students are indebted for tuition ; whereas the majority of these hold their offices as the most absolute sinecures, and the task of tuition devolves upon the tutors appointed in each particular college. These tutors are called public tutors ; meaning that they do not confine their instructions to any one individual, but distribute them amongst all the Undergraduates of the college to which they belong ; and, in addition to these, private tutors are allowed to any student who chooses to increase his expenditure in that particular. But the main distinction, which applies to our immediate subject, is the more than regal provision for the lodging and accommodation of the students by the system of Colleges. Of these there are in Oxford, neglecting the technical subdivision of Halls, five-and-twenty ; and the main use of all, both colleges and halls, is not, as in Scotland and on the Continent, to lodge the head of the University with suitable dignity, and to provide rooms for the library and public business of the University. These purposes are met by a separate provision, distinct from the colleges ; and the colleges are applied as follows : 1st, and mainly, to the reception of the Fellows, and of the Undergraduate Students ; 2dly, to the accommodation of the head (known in different colleges by the several designations of provost, principal, dean, rector, warden, &c.) ; 3dly, to the accommodation of the private library attached to that college, and to the chapel, which is used at least twice every day for public prayers ; 4thly, to the Hall, and the whole establishment of kitchen, wine vaults, buttery, &c, &c., which may be supposed necessary for the liberal accommodation, at the public meals of dinner (and in some colleges supper) of gentlemen and visitors from the country, or from the Continent,—varying (we will suppose) from 25 to 500 heads. Everywhere else the great mass of the students are lodged in obscure nooks and corners, which may or may not be respectable, but are at all events withdrawn from the surveillance of the University. I shall state both the ground and the effect (or tendency rather) of this difference. Out of England, universities are not meant exclusively for professional men ; the sons of great landholders, and a large proportion of the sons of noblemen, either go through the same academic course as others, or a shorter course adapted to their particular circumstances. In England, again, the Church is supplied from the rank of gentry—not exclusively, it is true, but in a much larger proportion than anywhere else, except in Ireland. The corresponding ranks in Scotland, from their old connexions with France, have adopted (I believe) much more of the Continental plan for disposing of their sons at this period. At any rate, it will not be contended by any man that Scotland throws anything like the same proportion with England of her gentry and her peerage into her universities. Hence, a higher standard of manners and of habits presides at Oxford and Cambridge ; and, consequently, a demand for much higher accommodations would even otherwise have arisen, had not such a demand already been supplied by the munificence of our English princes and peers, both male and female, and, in one instance at least, of a Scottish Prince (Bahol). The extent of these vast Caravanseras enables the governors of the various colleges to furnish every student with a set of two rooms at the least, often with a suite of three—(I, who lived at Oxford on no more than my school allowance, had that number)—or in many cases with far more. In the superior colleges, indeed (superior, I mean, as to their purse and landed endowments), all these accommodations keep pace with the refinements of the age, and thus a connexion is maintained between the University and the landed Noblesse—upper and lower—of England, which must be reciprocally beneficial, and which, under other circumstances, could scarcely have taken place.

Of these advantages you may be sure that Mr. Wilson availed himself to the utmost extent. Instead of going to Balioi College, he entered himself at Magdalen, in the class of what are called "Gentlemen Commoners." All of us (you know) in Oxford and Cambridge wear an Academic dress, which tells at once our Academic rank with all its modifications. And the term "Gentleman Commoner" implies that he has more splendid costumes, and more in number; that he is expected to spend a great deal more money; that he enjoys a few trifling immunities; and that he has, in particular instances, something like a king's right of preemption, as in the choice of rooms, &c.

Once launched in this orbit, Mr. Wilson continued to blaze away for the four successive years, 1804, 1805, 1806, 1807, I believe without any intermission. Possibly I myself was the one sole gownsman who had not then found my attention fixed by his most heterogeneous reputation. In a similar case, Cicero tells a man that ignorance so unaccountable of another man's pretensions argued himself to be a homo ignorabilis; or, in the language of the Miltonic Satan, "Not to know me, argues thyself unknown." And that is true; a homo ignorabilis most certainly I was. And even with that admission it is still difficult to account for the extent and the duration of my ignorance. The fact is that the case well expresses both our positions: that he should be so conspicuous as to challenge knowledge from the most sequestered of anchorites expresses his life, that I should have right to absolute ignorance of him who was familiar as daylight to all the rest of Oxford—expresses mine. Never indeed before, to judge from what I have since heard upon inquiry, did a man, by variety of talents and variety of humours, contrive to place himself as the connecting link between orders of men so essentially repulsive of each other, as Mr. Wilson in this instance.

“Omnis Aristippum decuit color, et status, et res.”

From the learned president of his college, Dr. Routh, the editor of parts of Plato, and of some Theological Selections, with whom Wilson enjoyed an unlimited favour—from this learned Academic Doctor, and many others of the same class, Wilson had an infinite gamut of friends and associates, running through every key, and the diapason closing full in groom, cobbler, stable-boy, barber's apprentice, with every shade and hue of blackguard and ruffian. In particular, amongst this latter kind of worshipful society, there was no man who had any talents—real or fancied—for thumping or being thumped, but had experienced some preeing of his merits from Mr. Wilson. All other pretensions in the gymnastic arts he took a pride in humbling or in honouring; but chiefly his examinations fell upon pugilism, and not a man, who could either “give” or “take,” but boasted to have punished, or to have been punished by, Wilson of Mallens.<sup>1</sup>

A little before the time at which my acquaintance with Mr. Wilson commenced, he had purchased a beautiful estate on the lake of Windermere, which bore the ancient name of Elleray—a name which, with his customary good taste, Mr. Wilson has never disturbed. With the usual latitude of language in such cases, I say on Windermere, but in fact this charming estate lies far above the lake; and one of the most interesting of its domestic features is the foreground of the rich landscape which connects, by the most gentle scale of declivities, this almost aerial altitude (as, for habitable ground, it really is) with the sylvan margin of the deep water which rolls a mile and a half below. When I say a mile and a half, you will understand me to compute the

<sup>1</sup> The usual colloquial corruption of Magdalen in Ox. is Maudlin; but amongst the very lie du peuple it is called Mallens.

[The second portion of the paper ended here, but with this added paragraph—“But this part of Wilson's life presents too wide a field, and abounds with too many incidents, to be compressed within this letter, I must therefore solicit the privilege of trespassing on another number of the Edinburgh Literary Gazette.”—M.]

descent according to the undulations of the ground ; because else the perpendicular elevation above the level of the lake cannot be above one half of that extent. Seated on such an eminence, but yet surrounded by foregrounds of such quiet beauty, and settling downwards towards the lake by such tranquil steps as to take away every feeling of precipitous or dangerous elevation, Elleray possesses a double character of beauty, rarely found in connexion ; and yet each, by singular good fortune, in this case absolute and unrivalled in its kind. Within a bow-shot of each other may be found stations of the deepest seclusion, fenced in by verdurous walls of insuperable forest heights, and presenting a limited scene of beauty—deep, solemn, noiseless, severely sequestered—and other stations of a magnificence so gorgeous as few estates in this island can boast, and of those few perhaps none in such close connexion with a dwelling-house. Stepping out from the very windows of the drawing-room, you find yourself on a terrace which gives you the feeling of a “specular height,” such as you might expect on Ararat, or might appropriately conceive on “Athos seen from Samothrace” The whole course of a noble lake, about eleven miles long, lies subject to your view, with many of its islands, and its two opposite shores so different in character : the one stern, precipitous, and gloomy ; the other (and luckily the hither one) by the mere bounty of nature and of accident—by the happy disposition of the ground originally, and by the fortunate equilibrium between the sylvan tracts, meandering irregularly through the whole district, and the proportion left to verdant fields and meadows,—wearing the character of the richest park scenery, except indeed that this character is here and there a little modified by a quiet hedge-row or the stealing smoke which betrays the embowered cottage of a labourer. But the sublime, peculiar, and not-to-be-forgotten feature of the scene is the great system of mountains which unite about five miles off at the head of the lake to lock in and inclose this noble landscape. The several ranges of mountains which stand at various distances within six or seven miles of the little town of Ambleside, all separately various in their forms and all eminently picturesque, when seen from Elleray appear to blend and group as parts of one connected whole ; and, when their usual drapery of clouds happens to take a fortunate arrangement, and the sunlights are properly broken and thrown from the most suitable quarter of the heavens, I cannot recollect any spectacle in England or Wales, of the many hundreds I have seen bearing a local, if not a national, reputation for magnificence of prospect, which so much dilates the heart with a sense of power and aerial sublimity as this terrace view from Elleray. It is possible that I may have stood on other mountain terraces commanding as ample a view and as happily combined; but the difference of effect must always be immense between a spectacle to which you ascend by half a day's labour, and that upon which you are launched in a second of time from the breakfast table. It is of great importance, for the enjoyment of any natural scene, to be liberated from the necessity of viewing it under circumstances of haste and anxiety, to have it in one's power to surrender one's self passively and tranquilly to the influences of the objects as they gradually reveal themselves, and to be under no summons to crowd one's whole visual energy and task of examination within a single quarter of an hour. Having seen Elleray at all times under these favourable circumstances, it is certainly not impossible that I may unconsciously have overrated in some degree its pretensions in comparison with some rival scenes. I may have committed the common error of attributing to the objects the whole sum of an impression which in part belonged to the subjective advantages of the contemplator and the benefits of his station. But, making every allowance in this direction, I am still of opinion that Elleray has, in connexion with the merits common to all scenes of its class, others peculiar to itself—and such as are indispensable conditions for the full effect of all the rest. In particular, I would instance this.—To bring any scene upon a level of competition with Elleray as to range and majesty of prospect, it is absolutely essential that it should occupy an equal elevation, or one not conspicuously inferior. Now, it is seldom indeed that eminences so commanding are not, by that very circumstance, unfitted to the picturesque aspects of things: in fact I remember no tract of ground so elevated as Elleray from which the lowest level of the adjacent country does not take a petty, dotted, and map-like appearance.

But this effect, which is so heavy a price for the sublimities of the upper regions, at Elleray is entirely intercepted by the exquisite gradations of descent by which the contiguous grounds begin their fall to the level of the lake : the moment that this fall in any quarter becomes accelerated and precipitous, it is concealed by the brows of this beautiful hanging foreground, and so happily is this remedy applied that in every instance where the lowest grounds would, if seen at all, from their immediate proximity, be seen by the spectator looking down perpendicularly as into a well, there they are uniformly hidden ; and these lowest levels first emerge to view at a remote distance—where, being necessarily viewed obliquely, they suffer no peculiar disadvantage by being viewed from an eminence. In short, to sum up the whole in one word, the splendours of Elleray, which could not have been had but at an unusual elevation, are by a rare bounty of nature obtained without one of those sacrifices for the learned eye which are usually entailed upon that one single advantage of unusual elevation.

The beautiful estate which I have thus described to you was ornamented by no suitable dwelling-house at the time when it was purchased by Mr. Wilson. There was indeed a rustic cottage, most picturesquely situated, which, with the addition of a drawing-room thrown out at one end, was made for the present (and, as it turned out, for many a year to come) capable of meeting the hospitable system of life adopted by its owner. But, with a view to more ample and luxurious accommodations, even at that early period of his possession (1808), Mr. Wilson began to build a mansion of larger and more elegant proportions. The shell, and perhaps the greater part of the internal work, was soon finished, but, for some reason which I never remember to have inquired into, was not rendered thoroughly habitable (and consequently not inhabited) till the year 1825. I think it worth while to mention this house particularly, because it has always appeared to me a silent commentary on its master's state of mind, and an exemplification of his character both as it was and as it appeared. At first sight there was an air of adventurousness, or even of extravagance, about the plan and situation of the building ; and yet, upon a considerate examination (and latterly upon a practical trial) of it, I cannot see that within the same dimensions it would have been possible to have contrived a more judicious or commodious house. Thus, for instance, the house is planted upon the boldest and most exposed point of ground that can be found on the whole estate, consequently upon that which might have been presumed (and I believe was really reputed) to be the very stormiest: yet, whether from counteracting screens of wood that have since been reared in fortunate situations, or from what other cause I know not, undoubtedly at this day no practical inconvenience is suffered; though it is true, I believe, that in the earlier years of its history the house bore witness occasionally, by dismal wrecks of roof and windows, to the strength and fury of the wind on one particular quarter. Again, in the internal arrangements: one room was constructed of such ample proportions, with a view to dancing, that the length (as I remember) was about seventy feet; the other dimensions I have forgotten. Now, in this instance most people saw an evidence of nothing but youthful extravagance, and a most disproportionate attention directed to one single purpose, which upon that scale could not probably be of very frequent occurrence in any family. This by the way was at any rate a sensible extravagance in my judgment; for our English mode of building tends violently to the opposite and most unwholesome extravagance of giving to the very principal room of a house the beggarly proportions of closets. However, the sequel showed that, in providing for one end, Mr. Wilson had not lost sight of others: for the seventy-foot room was so divided by strong folding-doors, or temporary partitions, as in its customary state to exhibit three rooms of ordinary proportions, and unfolded its full extent only by special and extraordinary mechanism. Other instances I might give in which the plan seemed to be extravagant or inconsiderate, and yet really turned out to have been calculated with the coolest judgment and the nicest foresight of domestic needs. It is sufficient to say that I do not know a house apparently more commodiously arranged than this, which was planned and built with utmost precipitation, and in the very hey-day of a most tempestuous youth. In one thing only, upon a retrospect at this day of the whole case, there may appear to have been some imprudence,—viz. that, timber being then at a most unprecedented high price, it is probable that the building cost seven or eight hundred pounds more than it would have done a few years later. Allowing for this one oversight, the principal house on the Elleray estate, which at the time was looked upon as an evidence of Mr Wilson's flightiness of mind, remains at this day a lasting monument of his good sense and judgment

Whilst I justify him, however, on this head, I am obliged to admit that on another field, at that very time, Mr. Wilson was displaying the most reckless profusion. A sailing club had been established on Windermere,—by whom I never heard; very probably by Mr. Wilson himself; at all events, he was the leader and the soul of the confederation, and he applied annually nothing less than a little fortune to the maintenance of the many expenses which arose out of it. Amongst the members of the club there were more than one who had far larger fortunes than Mr. Wilson could ever have possessed; but he would permit no one to outshine him on this arena. The number of his boats was so great as to compose a little fleet, and some of them, of unusually large dimensions for this lake, had been built at an enormous expense by regular builders brought over expressly from the port of Whitehaven (distant from Elleray about forty-five miles), and kept during the whole progress of their labour at a most expensive Lakers' hotel. One of these boats in particular, a ten-oared barge, which you will find specially introduced by name in Professor Wilson's tale of "The Foresters," was generally believed at the time to have cost him at the least five hundred pounds. And, as the number of sailors which it required to man these boats was necessarily very great at particular seasons, and as the majority of these sailors lived, during the period of their services, with little or no restraint upon their expenses at the most costly inn in the neighbourhood,—it may be supposed very readily that about this time Mr. Wilson's lavish expenditure, added to the demands of architects and builders, and the recent purchase of Elleray, must have seriously injured his patrimonial property,—though generally believed to have been originally considerably more than thirty thousand (many asserted forty thousand) pounds. In fact, he had never less than three establishments going on concurrently for some years: one at the town or village of Bowness (the little port of the lake of Windermere), for his boatmen; one at the Ambleside Hotel, about five miles distant, for himself; and a third at Elleray, for his servants, and the occasional resort of himself and his friends. It is the opinion of some people that about this time, and during the succeeding two years, Mr Wilson dissipated the main bulk of his patrimony in profuse expenditure. But more considerate people see no ground for that opinion. His expenses, though great, were never adequate to the dilapidation of so large an estate as he was reputed to have inherited. and the prevailing opinion is that some great loss of £20,000 at a blow, by the failure of some trustee or other, was the true cause of that diminution in his property which, within a year or two from this time, he is generally supposed to have suffered. However, as Mr. Wilson himself has always maintained an obstinate silence on the subject, and as the mere fact of the loss (however probable) is not more accurately known to me than its extent, or its particular mode, or its cause,—I shall not allow myself to make any conjectural speculations on the subject. It can be interesting to you and me only from one of its consequences,—viz. its leading him afterwards to seek a professorship: for most certain it is that, if the splendour of Mr. Wilson's youthful condition as to pecuniary matters had not been in some remarkable degree overcast, and suffered some signal eclipse, he would never have surrendered any part of that perfect liberty which was so dear to him for all the honours and rewards that could have been offered by the foremost universities of Europe.

You will have heard, no doubt, from some of those with whom you have conversed about Professor Wilson when you were in Europe, or you may have read it in Peter's Letters,<sup>1</sup> that in very early life (probably about the age of eighteen) he had formed a scheme for penetrating into Central Africa, visiting the city of Timbuctoo, and solving (if it were possible) the great outstanding problem of the source of the Niger. To this scheme he was attracted probably not so much by any particular interest in the improvement of geographical knowledge, as by the youthful spirit of romantic adventure, and a very uncommon craving for whatever was grand, indefinite, and gigantic in conception, supposing that it required at the same time great physical powers in the execution. There cannot be a doubt for us at this day, who look back upon the melancholy list of victims in this perilous field of discovery which has been furnished by the two or three and twenty years elapsed since Mr. Wilson's plan was in agitation, that in that enterprise—had he ever irretrievably embarked himself upon it—he would infallibly have perished; for, though reasonably strong, he was not strong upon that heroic scale which an expedition so Titanic demands; and, what was perhaps still more important, if strong enough, he was not hardy enough,—as a gentleman rarely is, more especially where he has literary habits; because the exposure to open air, which is the indispensable condition of hardiness, is at any rate interrupted—even if it were not counteracted—by the luxurious habits and the relaxing atmosphere of the library and the drawing-room. Moreover, Mr. Wilson's constitution was irritable and disposed to fever, his temperament was too much that of a man of genius not to have furnished a mine of inflammable materials for any tropical climate; his prudence, as regarded his health, was not remarkable, and, if to all these internal and personal grounds of danger you add the incalculable hazards of the road itself, every friend of Mr. Wilson's must have rejoiced on hearing that in 1808, when I first met him, this Tim- (or Tom-) buctoo scheme was already laid aside.

<sup>1</sup> Lockhart's Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk, published in 1819.—M

Yet, as the stimulus of danger, in one shape or other, was at that time of life perhaps essential to his comfort, he soon substituted another scheme, which at this day might be accomplished with ease and safety enough, but in the year 1809 (under the rancorous system of Bonaparte) was full of hazard. In this scheme he was so good as to associate myself as one of his travelling companions, together with an earlier friend of his own—an Englishman, of a philosophical turn of mind, with whom he had been a fellow-student at Glasgow; and we were certainly all three of an age and character to have enjoyed the expedition in the very highest degree, had the events of the war allowed us to realize our plan. The plan was as follows :—From Falmouth, by one of the regular packets, we were to have sailed to the Tagus, and, landing wherever accident should allow us, to purchase mules, hire Spanish servants, and travel extensively in Spain and Portugal for eight or nine months ; thence, by such of the islands in the Mediterranean as particularly interested us, we were gradually to have passed into Greece, and thence to Constantinople. Finally, we were to have visited the Troad, Syria, Egypt, and perhaps Nubia. I feel it almost ludicrous to sketch the outline of so extensive a tour, no part of which was ever executed ; such a Barmecide feast is laughable in the very rehearsal. Yet it is bare justice to ourselves to say that on our parts there was no slackness or make-believe: what put an extinguisher upon our project was the entrance of Napoleon into Spain, his immediate advance upon Madrid, and the wretched catastrophe of the expedition so miserably misconducted under Sir John Moore. The prestige of French generalship was at that time a nightmare upon the courage and spirit of hopeful exertion throughout Europe ; and the earliest dawn was only then beginning to arise of that glorious experience which was forever to dissolve it. Sir J. Moore, and through him his gallant but unfortunate army, was the last conspicuous victim to the mere sound and humbug (if you will excuse a coarse expression) of the words Napoleon Bonaparte. What he fled from was precisely those two words. And the timid policy adopted by Sir John on that memorable occasion would—among other greater and national consequences—have had this little collateral interest to us unfortunate travellers, had our movements been as speedy as we had anticipated, that it would have cost us our heads. A certain bulletin, issued by Bonaparte at that time, sufficiently apprised us of that little truth. In this bulletin Bonaparte proclaimed with a careless air, but making at the same time somewhat of a boast of it, that, having happened to meet a party of sixteen British travellers—persons of whom he had ascertained nothing at all but that they did not bear a military character—he had issued a summary order that they should all be strung up without loss of time by the neck. In this little facetious anecdote, as Bonaparte seemed to think it, we read the fate that we had escaped. Had nothing occurred to retard our departure from this country, we calculated that the route we had laid down for our daily motions would have brought us to Guadarama (or what was the name of the pass ?) just in time to be hanged. Having a British general at our backs with an army of more than thirty thousand effective men, we should certainly have roamed in advance with perfect reliance upon the old British policy of fighting, for which we could never have allowed ourselves to dream of such a substitute as a flight through all the passes of Galicia on the principle of "the D— take the handmost." Infallibly also we should have been surprised by the extraordinary rapidity at that time of the French movements, our miserable shambling mules, with their accursed tempers, would have made but a shabby attempt at flight before a squadron of light cavalry, and in short, as I said before, we should have come just in time to be hanged. And hanged we should all have been: though why, and upon what principle, it would be difficult to say, and probably that question would have been left to after consideration in some more philosophical age. You will suppose naturally that we rejoiced at our escape, and so undoubtedly we did. Yet, for my part, I had, among nineteen-twentieths of joy, just one-twentieth of a lingering regret that we had missed the picturesque fate that awaited us. The reason was this: it has been through life an infirmity of Mr. Wilson's (at least in my judgment an infirmity) to think too indulgently of Bonaparte, not merely in an intellectual point of view, but even with reference to his pretensions—hollower, one would think, than the wind—to moral elevation and magnanimity. Such a mistake, about a man who could never in any one instance bring himself to speak generously, or even forbearingly, of an enemy, rouses my indignation as often as I recur to it; and in Professor Wilson I have long satisfied myself that it takes its rise from a more comprehensive weakness, the greatest in fact which besets his mind, viz. a general tendency to bend to the prevailing opinion of the world, and a constitutional predisposition to sympathise with power and whatsoever is triumphant. Hence, I could not but regret most poignantly the capital opportunity I had forfeited of throwing in a deep and stinging sarcasm at his idol, just at the moment when we should have been waiting to be turned off. I know Professor Wilson well: though a brave man, at twenty-two he enjoyed life with a rapture that few men have ever known, and he would have clung to it with awful tenacity. Horribly he would have abominated the sight of the rope, and ruefully he would have sighed if I had suggested to him on the gallows any thoughts of that beautiful and quiet Ellera which he had left behind in England. Just at that moment I acknowledge that it would have been fiendish, but yet what a heaven of a luxury it would have been in the way of revenge—to have stung him with some neat epigram, that I might have composed in our walk to the gallows, or while the ropes were getting into tune, on the generosity and magnanimity of Bonaparte! Perhaps, in a sober estimate, hanging might be too heavy a price for the refutation of a single error; yet still, at times, when my moral sense is roused and provoked by the obstinate blindness of Professor Wilson to the meanness and parvanimity<sup>1</sup> of Bonaparte (a blindness which in him, as in all other worshippers of false idols, is connected at the moment with intense hatred for those who refuse to partake in it), a wandering regret comes over me that we should have missed so fine an opportunity for gathering in our own persons some of those redundant bounties which the Corsican's "magnanimity" at that time scattered from his cornucopia of malice to the English name upon all his unfortunate prisoners of that nation.

But enough of this. An event soon occurred in Mr. Wilson's life which made it a duty to dismiss forever all travelling schemes that were connected with so much hazard as this. The fierce acharnement of Bonaparte so pointedly directed to everything English, and the prostration of the Continent, which had enabled him absolutely to seal every port of Europe against an Englishman,—who could now no longer venture to stray a mile beyond the range of the ship's guns which had brought him to the shore, without the certainty of being arrested as a spy,—this unheard-of condition of things had at length compelled all English gentlemen to reconcile themselves for the present to the bounds of their own island ; and, accordingly, in the spring of 1809, we three unchangeable friends had entirely weaned our minds from the travelling scheme which had so completely occupied our thoughts in 1808. Mr. Wilson in particular gave himself up to the pleasures and occupations furnished by the neighbourhood of Windermere, which at that time were many and various ; living myself at a distance of nine miles from Elleray, I did not see much of him through this year 1809, in 1810 he married a young English lady, greatly admired for her beauty and the elegance of her manners, who was generally supposed to have brought him a fortune of about ten thousand pounds. In saying that, I violate no confidence at any time reposed in me, for I rely only on the public voice—which, in this instance, I have been told by well-informed persons, was tolerably correct. Be that as it may, however, in other respects I have the best reasons for believing that this marriage connexion has proved the happiest event of Mr. Wilson's life ; and that the delightful temper and disposition of his wife have continued to shed a sunshine of peace and quiet happiness over his domestic establishment, which were well worth all the fortunes in the world. This lady has brought him a family of two sons and three daughters, all interesting by their personal appearance and their manners, and at this time rapidly growing up into young men and women.

<sup>1</sup> I coin this word parvanimity as an adequate antithesis to magnanimity; for the word pusillanimity has received from usage such a confined determination to one single idea, viz. the defect of spirit and courage, that it is wholly unfitted to be the antipode to the complex idea of magnanimity.

Here I should close all further notice of Mr. Wilson's life, and confine myself, through what remains of the space which I have allowed myself, to a short critical notice (such as it may be proper for a friend to write) of his literary character and merits ; but one single event remains of a magnitude too conspicuous in any man's life to be dismissed wholly without mention. I should add, therefore, that, about eight or nine years after his marriage (for I forget the precise year), Mr. Wilson offered himself a candidate for the chair of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, which had recently become vacant by the death of Dr. Thomas Brown, the immediate successor of Mr. Dugald Stewart. The Scotch, who know just as much about what they call "Moral<sup>1</sup> Philosophy" and Metaphysics as the English do, viz. exactly nothing at all, pride themselves prodigiously upon these two names of Dugald Stewart and Dr. Brown, and imagine that they filled the chair with some peculiar brilliance. Upon that subject a word or two farther on. Meantime this notion made the contest peculiarly painful and invidious, amongst ungenerous enemies, for any untried man—no matter though his real merits had been a thousand times greater than those of his predecessors. This Mr. Wilson found. he had made himself enemies,—whether by any unjustifiable violences and wanton provocations on his own part, I have no means of knowing. In whatever way created, however, these enemies now used the advantages of the occasion with rancorous malignity, and persecuted him at every step with unrelenting fury. Very different was the treatment he met with from his competitor in the contest<sup>2</sup>. In that one circumstance of the case, the person of his competitor, he had reason to think himself equally fortunate and unfortunate: fortunate, that he should be met by the opposition of a man whose opposition was honour—a man of birth, talents, and high breeding, a good scholar, and for extensive reading and universal knowledge of books (and especially of philosophic literature) the Magliabecchi of Scotland; unfortunate on the other hand that this accomplished opponent, adorned by so many brilliant gifts that recommended him to the contested office, should happen to be his early and highly valued friend. The particular progress of the contest, and its circumstances, I am not able to state. In general, I have heard in Edinburgh that, from political influences which chiefly governed the course of the election, the conduct of the partisans (perhaps on both sides) was intemperate, personal, and unjust; whilst that of the principals and their immediate friends was full of forbearance and generosity. The issue was that Mr Wilson carried the Professorship,<sup>1</sup>—by what majority of votes, I am unable to say; and you will be pleased to hear that any little coolness, which must naturally have succeeded to so warm a contest, has long since passed away, and the two rival candidates have been for many years restored to their early feelings of mutual esteem and regard.

<sup>1</sup> Everywhere in the world except in Scotland, by moral philosophy is meant the philosophy of the will, as opposed to the philosophy of the intellect. In Scotland only the word moral is used, by the strongest abuse, as a comprehensive designation of whatsoever is not physical; so that in the cycle of knowledge undertaken by the Edinburgh Professor of Moral Philosophy are included logic, metaphysics, ethics, psychology, anthropology,—and, in one word, almost all human knowledge, with the exception of physics and mathematics.—[Not correct.—M.]

<sup>2</sup> Sir William Hamilton, then Professor of History in the University (1821-1836); afterwards (1836-1856) Professor of Logic and Metaphysics.—M.

Here I pause, for everything that concerns in the remotest way the incidents of Professor Wilson's life. one letter I mean to add, as I have already promised, on the particular position which he occupies in relation to modern literature; and then I have done.<sup>2</sup> Meantime, let me hope that you have not so far miscalculated my purpose as to have been looking out for anecdotes (i.e. scandal) about Professor Wilson throughout the course of this letter; since, if in any case I could descend to cater for tastes of that description (which, I am persuaded, are naturally no tastes of your family), you must feel, on reflection, how peculiarly impossible it is to take that course in sketching the character of a friend, because the very means by which in almost every case one becomes possessed of such private anecdotes are the opportunities thrown in one's way by the confiding negligence of affectionate friendship,—opportunities, therefore, which must be forever sacred to every man of honour.

Yours most faithfully,

PARMENIDES.

<sup>1</sup> This was in July 1820.—M.

<sup>2</sup> No such additional letter appeared.—M.

PROFESSOR WILSON

SKETCH IN 1850<sup>1</sup>

THERE are many Newtons in England: yet, for all that, there is but one Newton for earth and the children of earth; which Newton is Isaac, and Kepler is his prophet.<sup>2</sup> There

<sup>1</sup> From a number of Hogg's Instructor in that year. There was then running in that Edinburgh periodical a series of brief biographies of eminent persons, with the accompaniment of engraved portraits, under the title OUR PORTRAIT GALLERY; and De Quincey had been asked, or had volunteered, to write the sketch to accompany the portrait of Christopher North. This, accordingly, is the third sketch he has left us of that life-long friend of his,—the first in order of time having been that of 1829 in the Edinburgh Literary Gazette (immediately preceding this in the present volume), and the second that of 1840 in the series of his Literary and Lake Reminiscences in Tait's Magazine (reprinted ante, Vol. II). The present sketch is slight, and contains repetitions from the others, but it takes Wilson on to a later stage of his life. We take it from the reprint of it in vol. xvi of the previous collective edition of De Quincey's writings.—M.

<sup>2</sup> I use the word prophet in the ordinary sense. Yet in strictness this is not the primary sense. Primarily it means and Scripturally it means—interpreter of the divine purposes and thoughts. If those purposes and thoughts should happen to lurk in mysterious doctrines of religion, then the prophet is simply an exegetes, or expounder. But, it is true, if they lurk in the dark mazes of time and futurity unrolling itself from the central present, then the prophet means a seer or reader of the future, in our ordinary modern sense. But this modern sense is neither the Mahometan sense, nor that which prevails in the New Testament. Mahomet is the prophet of God—not in the sense of predictor from afar, but as the organ of communication between God and man, or revealer of the divine will. In St. Paul, again, gifts of prophecy mean uniformly any extraordinary qualifications for unfold-are many Wilsons in Scotland, and indeed many out of Scotland; yet, for all that, Mother Earth and her children recognise but one, which one sits in the Edinburgh chair of Moral Philosophy. And, when that is said, all is said; is there anything to say more? Yes, there is an infinity to say, but no need to say it!

“Cætera norunt

Et Tagus, et Ganges, forsan et Antipodes”

Such a radiance, which extinguishes all lesser lights, has its own evils. If a man like Mr Touchwood of the Hottle in “St Ronan’s Well” should find his way to Tim- (or to Tom-) buctoo,—no matter which, for Tim and Tom are very like each other (especially Tim),—in that case, he might have occasion to draw a bill upon England. And such a bill would assuredly find its way to its destination. The drawer of the bill might probably be intercepted on his homeward route, but the bill would not. Now, if this bill were drawn upon “John Wilson,” tout court, not a post-office in Christendom would scruple to forward it to the Professor. The Professor, in reply, would indorse upon it “No effects.” But in the end he would pay it, for his heart would yearn with brotherly admiration towards a man who had thumped his way to the very navel of Africa.

This mention, by the way, of Timbuctoo, forced upon us by an illustration, suddenly reminds us that the Professor himself, in the stage of early manhood, was self-dedicated to the adventure of Timbuctoo. What reasons arose to disturb this African scheme, it is strange that we have forgotten, or else that we have never heard. Possibly Major Houghton’s fate may have recalled Wilson, in the midst of his youthful enthusiasm, to that natural but afflicting fear which, “like the raven o’er the infected house,” sweeps at intervals over the martial hopes of most young soldiers,—viz the fear, not ing the meaning of Scripture doctrines, or introducing light and coherency amongst their elements, and perhaps never the qualifications for inspired foresight. In the true sense of the word, therefore, Newton was the prophet of Kepler, i. e. the exegetic commentator on Kepler, not Kepler of Newton. But the best policy in this world is to think with the wise and (generally speaking) to talk with the vulgar.

of death, but of death incurred for no commensurate return and with no rememberable circumstances. To die, to die early, that belongs to the chances of the profession which the soldier has adopted. But to die as an arde-de-camp in the act of riding across a field of battle with some unimportant order that has not even been delivered—to feel that a sacrifice so vast for the sufferer will not stir a ripple on the surface of that mighty national interest for which the sacrifice has been made—this it is which, in such a case, makes the pang of dying. Wilson had seen Mungo Park; from him he must have learned the sort of razor's-edge on which the traveller walks in the interior of Africa. The trackless forest, the unbridged river, the howling wilderness, the fierce Mahometan bigotry of the Moor, the lawlessness of the Pagan native, the long succession of petty despots—looking upon you with cruel contempt if you travel as a poor man, looking upon you with respect, but as a godsend ripe for wrecking, if you travel as a rich one—all these chances of ruin, with the climate superadded, leave too little of rational hopefulness to such an enterprise for sustaining those genial spirits without which nothing of that nature can prosper. A certain proportion of anxiety, or even of gloomy fear, is a stimulant; but in this excess they become killing as the frost of Labrador. Or, if not, only where a man has a demon within him. Such a demon had Park<sup>1</sup>. And a far mightier demon had Wilson,—

<sup>1</sup> “Park”:—It is painful, but at the same time it is affecting, for the multitudes who respect the memory of Park [1771-1805], to know that this brave man's run was accomplished through a weak place in his own heart. Park, upon his second expedition [in 1805], was placed in a most trying condition. We all know the fable of the traveller that resisted Boreas and his storms—his haul, his sleet, and his blustering blasts, there the traveller was strong, but he could not resist Phœbus, could not resist his flattering gales and his luxurious wooings. He yielded to the fascinations of love what he had refused to the defiance of malice. Such temptations had Park to face when, for the second time, he reached the coast of Africa. Had the world frowned upon him, as once upon the same coast it did, then he would have found a nobility in his own desolation. That he could have faced, and, without false bias, could have chosen what was best on the whole. But it happened that the African Association of London had shown him great confidence and great liberality. His sensitive generosity could not support the painful thought that, by delaying his expedition, he might seem to be abusing their kindness. He

but, luckily for us all, a demon that haunted the mind with objects more thoroughly intellectual

Wilson was born, we believe, in Paisley. It is the Scottish custom, through the want of great public schools for the higher branches of education, that universities, to their own great injury, are called upon to undertake the functions of schools. It follows from this that mere schoolboys are in Scotland sent to college; whereas, on our English system, none go to Oxford or Cambridge but young men ranging from eighteen to twenty. Agreeably to this Scottish usage, Wilson was sent at a boyish age to the university of Glasgow, and for some years was placed under the care of Professor Jardine. From Glasgow, and, we believe, in his eighteenth year, he was transferred to Oxford. The college which he selected was Magdalen, of which college Addison had been an alumnus. Here he entered as a gentleman-commoner, and, in fact, could not do otherwise; for Magdalen receives no others, except, indeed, those who are on the foundation, and who come thither by right of election. The very existence of such a class as gentlemen-commoners has been angrily complained of, as an undue concession of licence, or privilege, or distinction to mere wealth, when all distinction should naturally rise out of learning or intellectual superiority. But the institution had probably a laudable and a wise origin. The elder sons of wealthy families, who needed no professional employments, had no particular motive for resorting to the universities; and one motive they had against it—viz that they must thus come under a severer code of discipline than when living at home. In order, therefore, to conciliate this class, and to attract them into association with those who would inevitably give them some tincture of literary tastes and knowledge, an easier yoke, as regarded attendance upon lectures and other college exercises, was imposed upon all who, by assuming the higher expenditure of gentlemen-commoners,<sup>1</sup> professed themselves to be rich enough for living precipitated his motions, therefore, by one entire half-year. That original error threw him upon the wrong season, and drew after it the final error which led to the conflict in which he perished.

<sup>1</sup> "Gentlemen-commoners".—The name is derived from our Oxford word commons, which in ordinary parlance means whatever is furnished at the public dinner-table, or (in those colleges which still retain public

without a profession. The purpose had been, as we have no doubt, to diffuse the liberalities of literature throughout the great body of the landed aristocracy ; and for many generations, as it would be easy to show, that object had been respectably accomplished, for our old traditional portrait of the English country gentleman, from Fielding downwards to this ultra-democratic day, is a vulgar libel and a lie of malice. So far from being the bigoted and obtuse order described in popular harangues, the landed gentry of England has ever been the wisest order amongst us, and much ahead of the commercial body

From Oxford, on returning to Scotland, Wilson rejoined his mother, then living in Queen Street, Edinburgh. He adopted the law as his nominal profession, with no fixed resolution, perhaps, to practise it. About 1814, we believe, he was called to the bar. In 1818, he became Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh<sup>1</sup>, and, we think, it was in the previous year that Blackwood's Magazine was established, which, from the seventh number downwards (though latterly by intermitting fits), has continued to draw more memorable support from him than ever journal did from the pen of an individual writer. He was not the editor of that journal at any time. The late Mr. Blackwood, a sagacious and energetic man, was his own editor ; but Wilson was its intellectual Atlas, and very probably, in one sense, its creator—viz that he might be the first suggester (as undoubtedly he was at one time the sole executive realiser) of that great innovating principle started by this journal, under which it oscillated pretty equally between human life on the one hand and literature on the other.

suppers) at the supper-table. Reflecting at this moment upon the word, we should presume it to be the first two syllables colloquially corrupted of the Latin commensalia. A commoner is one who is a fellow-tablet, who eats his commensalia in company with other undergraduate students. A gentleman-commoner is one who by right may claim to be a fellow-tablet with the governing part of the college ; although in large colleges, where this order is extensive enough to justify such an arrangement, the gentle-commoners dine at a separate table. In Cambridge they bear the name of fellow-commoners.

<sup>1</sup> An error it was in 1820 —M.

Out of these magazine articles has been drawn the occasion of a grave reproach to Professor Wilson. Had he, it is said, thrown the same weight of energy and the same fiery genius into a less desultory shape, it is hard to compute how enormous and systematic a book he might have written. That is true : had he worked a little at the book every day of his life, on the principle of the Greek painter—nulla dies sine linea—by this time the book would have towered into that altitude as to require long ladders and scaffoldings for studying it ; and, like the Vicar of Wakefield's family picture, could find its way into no human chambers without pulling down the sides of the house. In the foot-notes, where the street lamps would keep him in order, the Professor might have carried on soberly enough. But in the upper part of the page, where he would feel himself striding away in nubibus, oh crimini ! what larkings there would have been, what sprees with the Aurora Borealis ! What a rise he would have taken out of us poor wretches below ! The man in the moon would have been frightened into apogee by the menaces of the crutch. And, after all, the book never could have been suffered to stay at home ; it must have been exported to central Asia on Dr. Johnson's principle, who said to Miss Knight,<sup>1</sup> a young Englishwoman of very large dimensions, when she communicated to the doctor her design to live on the Continent, "Do, my dear, by all means—really you are too big for an island." Certainly, awful thoughts of capsizing flit across the fancy when one sees too vast a bulk shipped on board our tight little Britannic ark. But, speaking seriously, the whole doctrine from which exhales this charge against the Professor of misapplied powers calls for revision. Wise was that old Grecian who said—Μέγα βιβλίον, μέγα κακόν—Big book, big nuisance ! For books are the military "baggage" of the human understanding in its endless march. And what is baggage ? Once in a hundred times it ministers to our marching necessities ; but for the other ninety-nine times it embarrasses the agility of our movement. And the Romans, therefore, who are the oldest and the best authorities on all military questions, expressed the upshot of these conflicting tendencies in the legionary baggage by calling it impedimenta, mere hindrances. They tolerated it, and why did they do that? Because, in the case 99 + 1 the baggage might happen to be absolutely indispensable. For the mere possibility of that one case, which, when it came, would not be evaded, they endured what was a nuisance through all the other cases. But they took a comic revenge by deriving the name from the ninety-nine cases where the baggage was a nuisance, rather than from the hundredth where it might chance to be the salvation of the army. To the author of every big book, so far from regarding him as a benefactor, the torture ought to be administered instantly by this interrogative dilemma. Is there anything new (which is not false) in your book? If he says—no, then you have a man, by his own confession, ripe for the gallows. If he says—yes, then you reply: What a wretch in that case must you be, that have hidden a thing which you suppose important to mankind in that great wilderness of a book, where I and other honest men must spend half a life in running about to find it! It is, besides, the remark of a clever French writer in our own days, that hardly any of the cardinal works upon which revolve the capital interests of man are large works. Plato, for instance, has but one of his many works large enough to fill a small octavo. Aristotle, as to bulk, is a mere pamphleteer, if you except perhaps four works; and each of those might easily be crowded into a duodecimo. Neither Shakspeare nor Milton has written any long work. Newton's Principia, indeed, makes a small quarto, but this arises from its large type and its diagrams: it might be printed in a pocket shape. And, besides all this, even when a book is a large one, we usually become acquainted with it but by extracts or by abstracts and abridgments. All poets of any length are read by snatches and fragments when once they have ascended to great popularity; so that the logic of the reproach against Professor Wilson is like that logic which Mr. Bald, the Scottish engineer, complained of in the female servants of Edinburgh. "They insist," said he, "upon having large blocks of coal furnished to them, they will not put up with any that are less: and yet every morning the cynic who delights in laughing at female caprices may hear these same women down in areas braying to pieces the unmanageable blocks, and using severe labour, for no purpose on earth but at last to bring the coal into that very state in which, without any labour at all, they might have had it from our collieries." So of Professor Wilson's works They lie now in short and detached papers—that is, in the very state fitted for reading, and, if he had hearkened to his counsellors, they would have been conglutinated into one vast block, needing a quarryman's or a miner's skill to make them tractable for household use.

<sup>1</sup> "Miss Knight" —This young lady had offered her homage to Dr. Johnson by extending his Rasselas into a sequel entitled Dinarbus.

In so hasty a sketch of Professor Wilson, where it is inevitable to dismiss without notice much that is interesting, there is yet one aspect of his public pretensions which, having been unusually misrepresented, ought to be brought under a stronger light of examination. We mean his relation to the chair of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh. It is sometimes alleged, in disparagement of Professor Wilson, by comparison with his two immediate predecessors, Mr Dugald Stewart and Dr. Thomas Brown,<sup>1</sup> that they did, but that he does not, come forward with original contributions to philosophy. He is allowed the credit of lecturing splendidly; but the complaint is, that he does not place his own name on the roll of independent philosophers. There is some opening to demurs in this invidious statement, even as regards the facts. The quality of Wilson's lectures cannot be estimated, except by those who have attended them,—as none have been made public. On the other hand, Mr. Dugald Stewart and Dr. Thomas Brown are not the original philosophers which the objection supposes them. To have been multiplied through repeated editions is no argument even of notoriety or momentary acceptance; for these editions, both at home and in America, have been absorbed by students, on whom it was compulsory to become purchasers of the books used in their academic studies. At present, when it has almost ceased to be any recommendation to these writers that once they belonged to the Whig party, and when their personal connexions are fast disappearing, it is no longer doubtful that the interest in their works is undermined. Professor Ferrier of St. Andrews, one of the subtlest intellects in modern speculation,<sup>1</sup> has found himself compelled to speak with severity of both; and since then, in his edition of Reid, Sir William Hamilton (who chooses to lay himself under some restraint in reference to Mr. Stewart) has not scrupled to speak with open disrespect of Dr. Brown,<sup>2</sup>—once as regards a case of plagiarism, once upon that vast umbrageousness of superfluous wordiness which is so distressing to all readers of his works. Even the reputation, therefore, of these men shows signs of giving way. But that is nothing on other grounds, and in defiance of reputation the most flourishing, we have always felt that the first battery of sound logic unmasked against Dr. Brown must be fatal. That man could not be a philosopher who wrote the preposterous paper against Kaut in an early number of the Edinburgh Review. In reviewing a Prussian, he had not even mastered the German language, and was indebted to a Frenchman for the monstrous conceits which he imputed to the great founder of the Critical Philosophy. Mr. Dugald Stewart is so much the less vulnerable as he happens to be the more eclectic; in the little that is strictly his own, he is not less vulnerable. And it embitters the resentment against these men, that both spoke with unmeasured illiberality, and with entire ignorance, of philosophers the most distinguished in the last century.

<sup>1</sup> Dugald Stewart (1753-1828), Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh from 1785 to 1810; Thomas Brown (1778-1820), Professor from 1810 to 1820.—M

From these men, at least, Professor Wilson will have nothing to fear. He (which is a great blessing) will have nothing to recant; and, assuredly, that man who has ever been the most generous of literary men, and sometimes the most magnanimous and self-conquering in estimating the merits of his contemporaries, will never cause a blush upon the faces of his descendants by putting it in the power of an enemy to upbraid them with unbecoming language of scorn applied by him to illustrious extenders of knowledge. “If,” will be the language of those descendants, “if our ancestor did, as a professor, write nothing more than splendid abstracts of philosophy in its several sections, in other words a history of philosophy, even that is something beyond a vulgar valuation—a service to philosophy which few, indeed, have ever been in a condition to attempt. Even so, no man can doubt that he would be found a thousand times more impressive than the dull, though most respectable, Brucker, than Tennemann, than Tiedemann (not Tedioumann), than Buhle, and so forth. If he did no more than cause to transmigrate into new forms old or neglected opinions, it is not certain that in this office the philosopher whom custom treats as the secondary mind does not often transcend his principal. It is, at least, beyond a doubt that Jeremy Taylor and Paul Richter, both of whom Professor Wilson at times recalls, oftentimes, in reporting an opinion from an old cloistered casuist, or from a dyspeptic schoolman blinking upon Aristotle with a farthing rushlight, lighted it up with a triple glory of haloes, such as the dull originator could never have comprehended. If therefore," it will be said, "Professor Wilson did no more than reanimate the fading and exorcise the dead, even so his station as a philosopher is not necessarily a lower one."

<sup>1</sup> James F. Ferrier, 1808-1864. He was a son-in-law of Professor Wilson.—M.

<sup>2</sup> Sir William Hamilton's edition of Reid was published in 1846.—M.

True, but upon that a word or two. We have been hitherto assuming for facts the allegations put forward—sometimes by the careless, sometimes by the interested and malignant. Now let us look out for another version of the facts.

Our own version we beg to introduce by a short preface. The British Universities are, but the German Universities are not, connected with the maintenance of the national faith. The reasons of this difference rest upon historical and political grounds. But the consequences of this difference are that the British professor in any faculty bearing on theology is under conscientious restraints, which a little further on we will explain, such as the German professor does not recognise, and is not by any public summons called upon to recognise.

It is ordinarily supposed,—and no person has argued the case upon that footing with more bitterness or more narrowness of view than Lord Brougham, — that Oxford, when imposing a subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles of the English Church, means or wishes to lay a restraint upon the free movement of the subscriber's intellect. But the true theory of that exaction is this—that Oxford, aiming at no such flagrant impossibility, seeks to bind over the student, by obligations of honour and by reverence for the sanctity of a promise, to do—what? Is it that he will not stray in thought beyond the limits staked out by the Thirty-nine Articles? That is a promise which no man could be sure of keeping; a promise, therefore, which an honest man would not deliberately make, and which, for the same reason, no honest body of men would seek to exact. Not this, not the promise to believe as the Church of England believes, but the promise that he will not publish or manifest his secret aberrations from this standard, is the promise involved in the student's subscription. Now, mark the effects of this. Oxford has thus preoccupied the mind of the student with a resisting force as regards the heaviest temptation to tamper with dangerous forms of opinion, religious or irreligious, during that period when the judgment is most rash, and the examination most limited. The heaviest temptation lies through the vanity connected with the conscious eccentricity and hardihood of bold free-thinking. But this vanity cannot be gratified in Oxford, it is doomed to be starved, unless through a criminal breach of fidelity to engagements solemnly contracted. That oath, which, and which only, was sacred in the eyes of a chivalrous French king, viz For du gentil-homme, is thus made to reinforce and rivet the oath (more binding, as might seem, but under the circumstances far less so) of For du chrétien. For a case of conscientious conviction may be imagined which would liberate the student from this latter oath applied to his creed, but no case can be imagined which would liberate him from the other oath, enforcing the obligation to silence. Oxford, therefore, applies a two-fold check to any free-thinking pruriencies in the student's mind. 1st, She quells them summarily, a parte post, by means of the guarantee which she holds from him; 2dly, She silently represses the growth of such pruriencies, a parte ante, by exacting bonds against all available uses of such dallings with heresy or infidelity. Now, on the other hand, in the German universities generally, these restraints on excesses of free-thinking do not exist. The course of study leads, at every point, into religious questions, or questions applicable to religion. All modes of philosophical speculation, metaphysics, psychology, ethics, connect themselves with religion. There is no interdict or embargo laid upon the wildest novelties in this direction. The English subscription had been meant to operate simply in that way; simply to secure an armistitium, a suspension of feuds, in a place where such feuds were disrespectful to the institutions of the land, or might be perilous, and in a stage of life when they would too often operate as pledges given prematurely by young men to opinions which afterwards, in riper intellect, they might see reason, but not have the candour or the courage, to abandon.

It follows from this state of things that a German professor is thrown upon his discretion and his own individual conscience for the quality of his teaching. But the British professor is thrown upon a public conscience, embodied in usages adapted to the institutions of his country. In Edinburgh, it is true, the students are not bound by subscriptions to any Confession of Faith. But that the whole course of instruction, or at least of that instruction which emanates from the chair of Moral Philosophy, is understood to be connected with the religion of the land, appears from this that the theological students—those who are to fill the ministerial office in the churches of Scotland—cannot arrive at that station without a certificate of having attended the Moral Philosophy Lectures. There is, therefore, a secret understanding which imposes upon the professor a duty of adapting his lectures to this call upon him. He is not left at liberty to amuse himself with scholastic subtleties, and those who have done so should be viewed as deserters of their duty. He is called upon to give such a representative account of current philosophy as may lay open those amongst its treasures which are most in harmony with Christian wisdom, and may arm the future clergyman against its most contagious errors. For Fichte or for Schelling the path was open to mere Athenian subtlety upon any subject that might most tax their own ingenuity, or that of their hearers. But the British professor of moral philosophy is straitened by more solemn obligations.—

“Nobis non licet esse tam discretis, Qui musas colimus severiores.”

Hence it would be no just blame, but the highest praise, to Professor Wilson, if his lectures really did wear the character imputed to him—of being rich and eloquent abstracts, rather than scholastic exertations in untried paths. We speak in the dark as to the facts, but at the same time we offer a new version, a new mode of interpreting, the alleged facts, supposing them to have been accurately stated.

Is that all? No; there is another, and a far ampler philosophy—a philosophy of human nature, like the philosophy of Shakspeare, and of Jeremy Taylor, and of Edmund Burke, which is scattered through the miscellaneous papers of Professor Wilson. Such philosophy by its very nature is of a far higher and more aspiring nature than any which lingers upon mere scholastic conundrums. It is a philosophy that cannot be presented in abstract forms, but hides itself as an incarnation in voluminous mazes of eloquence and poetic feeling. Look for this amongst the critical essays of Professor Wilson; which, for continual glimpses and revelations of hidden truth, are perhaps absolutely unmatched. By such philosophy his various courses of lectures—we speak on the authority of many of his highest students—are throughout distinguished; and more especially those numerous disquisitions on Man's Moral Being, his Passions, his Affections, and his Imagination, in which Professor Wilson displays his own genius, its originality and power.

With this brief sketch of one who walks in the van of men the most memorable and original that have adorned our memorable and original age, we conclude by saying, in a spirit of simplicity and fidelity to the truth, that from Professor Wilson's papers in Blackwood, but above all from his meditative examinations of great poets, Greek and English, may be formed a florilegium of thoughts the most profound and the most gorgeously illustrated that exist in human composition.

Of his poems or his prose tales we have not spoken : our space was limited ; and, as regards the poems in particular, there appeared some time ago in this very journal a separate critique upon them,—from whom proceeding we know not, but executed with great feeling and ability.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Wilson, De Quincey's most intimate Edinburgh friend to the last, died April 3, 1854, four years after this sketch of him. De Quincey outlived him nearly six years.—M.

SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON <sup>1</sup>

I

I BEGIN by entreating the reader, not so much in kindness (of which he may have none to spare) as in mere justice, to make allowance for this little sketch, as a sketch written under unfavourable circumstances. What circumstances? Why, written at a distance, in the first place, from the press; or, because in these days there is no such thing as distance, written under a difficulty almost incredible to myself of communicating with the press.<sup>2</sup> It is a fact that I can send a letter to Astrachan, or even to Bokhara (and, indeed, I meditate a letter to Bokhara, filled with reproaches to the sultan, whom I particularly detest), much more easily than I can plant a note in the hands of my publisher or his compositors. Once posted, the letter to Bokhara, like an arrow dismissed from a bow, will assuredly find out the sultan, without further "fash" on my part, and will cause a festering in his villainous heart<sup>3</sup>; and he can have no pretence for complaining of me to the Court of St. James's, since I shall pay the postage to the last farthing. Fluent as the flight of a swallow is the sultan's letter ; whereas the letter to my publisher describes a path that is zigzag, discontinuous, moving through harsh angles, and intersected at every turn by human negligences, or by inhuman treacheries of coachmen. The sultan presents a point-blank mark to my bullet ; but, to hit my publisher, I must fire round a corner , or, indeed, round three corners at once. That is one of the circumstances ; and it seems to follow that, unless my publisher could be prevailed on kindly to " flit " to Bokhara, there is no great prospect of opening a direct or rapid communication with him. Another of the evil circumstances is that I have no materials—not a scrap ; my sole resource being in a poor wearied brain, and in a memory which (although at intervals working like a steam-engine) oftentimes yearns for rest, and, with Themistocles, would humbly pray for some sweet voluptuous art of forgetting. With this brain, so time-shattered, I must work, in order to give significancy and value to the few facts which I possess—alas ! far too scanty as a basis for the very slightest superstructure. With this memory, so restive on such a mission of revisiting the past, I must go down into depths and shy recesses of time, over which dusky draperies are hanging, and voluminous curtains have long since fallen, such as I shrink from raising. Wordsworth points to images and phantom recollections that spontaneously

<sup>1</sup> This paper, nominally on Sir William Hamilton, but actually one of the most rambling and discursive of De Quincey's essays—with only a punch of Sir William Hamilton in it, flavouring a quantity of amusing matter about De Quincey himself and about anything else that occurred to him,—was begun in one of the numbers of Hogg's Instructor for 1852, as letterpress accompaniment to an engraved portrait of Sir William in that number, and was continued in two subsequent numbers. It was reprinted in 1871 in one of the supplementary volumes to the previous edition of De Quincey's writings.—M.

<sup>2</sup> Written, doubtless, in De Quincey's cottage at Lasswade.—M.

<sup>3</sup> And all of us detest him reasonably, who remember his treatment of poor Stoddart and Conolly, for no crime alleged but that of trusting to the hospitality and justice of his savage land.

" will sometimes leap
From hiding-places ten years deep ",

but in this case the earliest of my recollections must be rekindled painfully at depths far lower. Forty years, or near it, I must descend , and the case becomes that of a man forcing his way violently back into his burning house, under a vow of recovering some special jewels . if he is repelled by the flames, he suffers the mortification of a baffled purpose ; if he presses forward, and accomplishes his vow, then, perhaps, in the very midst of his success, he is scorched by the fire. Of all curses, that which searches deepest is the violent revelation through infinite darkness—a revelation like that " sudden blaze (Paradise Lost, b. ii) which far round illumined hell"—of a happiness or a glory which once and for ever has perished. Martyrdom it is, and no less, to revivify by effect of your own, or passively to see revivified, in defiance of your own fierce resistance, the gorgeous spectacles of your visionary morning life, or of your too rapturous noontide, relieved upon a background of funeral darkness. Such poisonous transfigurations, by which the paradise of youthful hours is forced into distilling demoniac misery for ruined nerves, exist for many a profound sensibility. And, as regards myself, touch but some particular key of laughter and of echoing music, sound but for a moment one bar of preparation, and immediately the pomps and glory of all that has composed for me the delirious vision of life re-awaken for torment; the orchestras of the earth open simultaneously to my inner ear; and in a moment I behold, forming themselves into solemn groups and processions, and passing over sad phantom stages, all that chiefly I have loved, or in whose behalf chiefly I have abhorred and cursed the grave—all that should not have died, yet died the soonest—the brilliant, the noble, the wise, the innocent, the brave, the beautiful. With these dreadful masks, and under the persecution of their malicious beauty, wakens up the worm that gnaws at the heart. Under that corrosion arises a hatred, blind and vague, and incomprehensible even to one's self, as of some unknown snake-like enemy, in some unknown hostile world, brooding with secret power over the fountains of one's own vitality. Such scourges, at any rate, must be borne where the machinery of the nerves brings round the hour of torment. But it forms a hard condition towards the possibility of a sketch like this—that, by recalling such vanished scenes too vividly, one obeys a summons to an active collusion and co-operation with one's own secret suffering, and becomes a fiery heautontimoroumenos (or self-tormentor) in the most afflicting sense.

Another circumstance of hardship, which entitles me to the special indulgence of the reader, is, that in this paper I am writing against time. Many are the matches which I have had against time in my time and in his time (i. e. in Time's time). And all such matches, writing or riding, are memorably unfair. Time, the meagre shadow, carries no weight at all; so what party can there be in any contest with him? What does he know of anxiety, or liver-complaint, or income-tax, or of the vexations connected with the correcting of proofs for the press? Although, by the way, he does take upon him himself, with his villainous scrawl, to correct all the fair proofs of nature. He sows canker into the heart of rosebuds, and writes wrinkles (which are his odious attempts at pothooks) in the lovehest of female faces. No type so fair but he fancies, in his miserable conceit, that he can improve it; no stereotype so fixed but he will alter it; and, having spoiled one generation after another, he still persists in believing himself the universal amender and the ally of progress. Ah! that one night, if it were but for one day in a century, be indulged with the sight of Time forced into a personal incarnation, so as to be capable of a personal insult—a cudgelling, for instance, or a ducking in a horse-pond. Or, again, that once in a century, were it but for a single summer's day, his corrected proofs might be liable to super-session by revisions, such as I would furnish, down the margin of which should run one perpetual iteration of stet, stet, everything that the hoary scoundrel had deleted, rosebuds or female bloom, beauty or power, grandeur or grace, being solemnly reinstated, and having the privilege of one day's secular resurrection, like the Arabian phoenix, or any other memento of power in things earthly and in sublunary births, to mock and to defy the scythe of this crowned thief!

But this eternal blazon must not be, or the reader will think himself to have fallen into the company of a madman, and perhaps at the first convenient turning will abscond. And yet, if he knew all that I could tell him about the villainies of Time, possibly he would participate in the acharnement of my hatred. I know that wretch better than the reader is likely to do. For the present, what I wish to have understood is, that the time available for my little paper is not at all commensurate to the dignity of its theme. By reason of what I mentioned above in regard to my publisher's procrastination in fixing himself at Bokhara, the correspondence with him is in that condition of circuitousness and liability to rests (which are very good in music, but shameful and disgusting in the post-office) that three-fourths of the time otherwise disposable for my paper perishes in holes and corners amongst the embezzlements of the road ; and every contraction in the rattons allowed as to hours and minutes regularly shows itself in a corresponding expansion of hurry and inevitable precipitancy as regards the quality of the composition. Not that always and unconditionally it is an evil to be hurried in writing for the press. I doubt not that many a score of practised writers for the press will have been self-observing enough to notice a phenomenon which I have many times noticed, viz that hurry and severe compression from an instant summons that brooks no delay have a tendency to often furnish the flint and steel for eliciting sudden scintillations of originality . sometimes in what regards the picturesque felicity of the phrase, sometimes in what regards the thought itself or its illustrations. To autoschedrare, or improvise, is sometimes in effect to be forced into a consciousness of creative energies that would else have slumbered through life. The same stimulation to the creative faculty occurs even more notoriously in musical improvisations ; and all great executants on the organ have had reason to bemoan their inability to arrest those sudden felicities of impassioned combinations, and those flying arabesques of loveliest melody, which the magnetic inspiration of the moment has availed to excite. Meantime, this possible advantage of hurry and adventurous precipitation for the kindling of originality applies less probably to a case in which philosophy happens to be concerned. But is the present a case of that order ? A philosopher is concerned undoubtedly, and a great one ; but philosophy not so much. The public would not bear it. One man may lead a horse to a pond, but twenty will not make him drink ; and a sip is all that the public collectively ever care to take from reservoirs of abstract philosophy. Yet, even in such a case, where leisurely thought is really a possible disadvantage in regard to the immediate prosperity of the composition, it is still indispensable in regard to its revision ; so that my title still remains good to a special indulgence.

But now, reader, do not worry me any more with questions or calls for explanation. When I do not know, nor how, but not the less I feel a mesmeric impression that you have been bothering me with magnetic passes : but for which interruptions, we should have been by this time a long way on our journey. I am now going to begin. You will see a full stop or period a very few inches farther on, lurking immediately under the word earnest on the off side ; and, from and after that full stop, you are to consider me as having shaken off all troublesome companions, and as having once for all entered upon business in earnest.

In the year 1814 it was that I became acquainted with Sir William Hamilton, the present Professor of Logic in the University of Edinburgh. I was then in Edinburgh for the first time, on a visit to Mrs. Wilson, the mother of Professor Wilson. Him, who at that time neither was a professor, nor dreamed of becoming one (his intention being to pursue his profession of advocate at the Scottish bar), I had known for a little more than five years. Wordsworth it was, then living at Allan Bank in Grasmere, who had introduced me to John Wilson ; and ever afterwards I was a frequent visitor at his beautiful place of Elleray, on Windermere, not above nine miles distant from my own cottage in Grasmere. In those days, Wilson sometimes spoke to me of his friend Hamilton, as of one specially distinguished by manliness and elevation of character, and occasionally gazed at as a monster of erudition. Indeed, the extent of his reading was said to be portentous—in fact, frightful ; and, to some extent, even suspicious ; so that certain ladies thought him “no canny”, for, if arithmetic could demonstrate that all the days of his life, ground down and pulverised into “wee wee” globules of five or eight minutes each, and strung upon threads, would not furnish a rosary anything like corresponding, in its separate beads or counters, to the books he was known to have studied and familiarly used, then it became clear that he must have had extra aid, and, in some way or other, must have read by proxy. Now, in that case, we all know in what direction a man turns for help, and who it is that he applies to when he wishes, like Dr. Faustus, to read more books than belong to his own allowance in this life. I hope sincerely there was no truth in these insinuations ; for, besides that it would be disagreeable to have a hanger-on like Mephistopheles expecting to receive a card every time that you gave a little dance, I, for my part, could have no reliance on the accuracy of his reading. The objection to Mephistopheles as a prosy reader would be absolutely fatal. Such a malicious wretch would leave out all the nots in critical places, as the printers fined by Laud did from the seventh commandment (reading "Thou shalt commit adultery"), and would discredit his principal's learning by continual falsifications of the text. I do trust and hope, therefore, that there was no ground for any such painful suspicions. Candour, however, obliges me to mention that at one time Sir William had a large dog in Great King Street, Edinburgh, very much answering to the description of the dog which Goethe, and at least one of our old Elizabethan dramatists, assign to poor Dr. Faustus. Surely it never could be the same identical dog, figuring first in Frankfort during the fifteenth century, and then in Edinburgh during the nineteenth!

An interest of curiosity in Sir William Hamilton had gradually, from some cause or other, combined in my mind with an interest of respect for his extraordinary attainments. Neither interest might possibly have sustained itself amongst the continual distractions of the world, had there been little prospect of forming his acquaintance. But the accident of my own visit to Edinburgh in 1814, whilst it suddenly ripened a remote chance into an instant certainty, deepened that already deep interest in Sir William's pretensions which had long given value to such a chance. Together with the certainty that I should now speedily enjoy a personal insight into the splendid accomplishments of this Titan amongst students, suddenly arose a profounder curiosity as to the exact range of these accomplishments. And I was truly happy when this anticipation was realised.

One morning I was sitting alone after breakfast, when Wilson suddenly walked in with his friend Hamilton. So exquisitely free was Sir William from all ostentation of learning that, unless the accidents of conversation made a natural opening for display, such as it would have been affectation to evade, you might have failed altogether to suspect that an extraordinary scholar was present. On this first interview with him, I saw nothing to challenge any special attention, beyond an unusual expression of kindness and cordiality in his abord. There was also an air of dignity and massy self-dependence diffused over his deportment, too calm and unaffected to leave a doubt that it exhaled spontaneously from his nature, yet too unassuming to mortify the pretensions of others. Men of genius I had seen before, and men distinguished for their attainments, who shocked everybody, and upon me in particular, nervously susceptible, inflicted with horror as well as distress, by striving restlessly and almost angrily for the chief share in conversation. Some I had known who possessed themselves in effect pretty nearly of the whole, without being distinctly aware of what they were about; and one autocratic gentleman there was among them, perfectly aware of what he was about, who (in the phrase of politicians) "went for" the whole from the very first; and, if things had come to that pass that he might not have all, gave notice, with vengeance blazing in his eyes, that he would have none. He was not to be done at his time of life by frivolous offers of a compromise that might have secured him seventy-five per cent. No, no; all without discount—that was his ultimatum. In Sir William Hamilton, on the other hand, was an apparent carelessness whether he took any conspicuous share or none at all in the conversation. It is possible that, as the representative of an ancient<sup>1</sup> family, he may secretly have felt his position in life; far less, however, in the sense of its advantages than of its obligations and restraints. And, in general, my con-

<sup>1</sup> Hamilton of Preston was, I believe, raised to the baronetcy about the middle of the second Charles's reign. It seems hard to reconcile with that fact a tradition, which I have repeatedly heard in conversation, that the Hamilton of that day was a Covenanter, and even a Drumlog rebel. If this were really so (but generally my impulse is to regard the whole generation of anecdotes as founded in lies), it would argue in the first baronet much obstinacy and perhaps a little lunacy. But these are excellent qualities on which to build a house, for in two centuries they lose their harshness, and mellow down into strength of will and reasonable eccentricity. In these days, when periodic literature traverses society through sections so vastly enlarged, and often not belonging in any sense to the classes professedly literary, it may be necessary to inform the young reader that the order of baronets did not arise until the reign of James I. Consequently, if we divide the duration of the order into four successive stages, the Preston baronetcy dates from the first clusion was, that at that time I had rarely seen a person who manifested less of self-esteem, under any of the forms by which ordinarily it reveals itself—whether of pride, or vanity, or full-blown arrogance, or heart-chilling reserve.

But, meantime, what was the peculiar and differential nature of Sir William's pursuits which had won for him already so much distinction, and against him so much expectation? for really a man's own merit often comes to act against him with deadliest hostility, when, by inflaming his reputation, it has also the power of too much inflaming the standard by which he will be tried. Sir William's reputation was as yet of that interesting (because somewhat mysterious) kind which has not yet crept into newspapers, but is moving, even locally, only through whispers. And in these whispers, forty years ago, there was nothing like the same principle of contagion that now exists. The cause of this lies partly in railways, which are not only swift in themselves, but the causes of swiftness in everything else, so that very soon, I am convinced, out of pure, blind sympathy with railway trains, men will begin to trot through the streets, and, in the next generation, unconsciously, they will take to cantering. We may see a proof of this in the increased vitality of slang. To my knowledge, it took eighteen years to transplant from Germany to this country the Greek word mythus—but, in more recent days, the absurd abuse of the word myth for a fib has not cost three years, when helped forward by female lips. And, as the whispers were then far below our existing whispers in velocity of circulation, they were no better as regarded accuracy. The first thing I heard about Sir William Hamilton was that he might be regarded as the modern Maghabecci, or even as a better Magliabecci, if better there could be. Now, you are aware, my youthful reader, or (if not) you soon shall be aware, that the said M. (whose long name I don't intend to spell over again) was that librarian, a hundred and fifty years ago,<sup>1</sup> to some Grand Duke of Tuscany, who, by dint of trotting and cantering over all pages of all books, could not only repeat verbatim et literatim any possible paragraph from any conceivable book, and, letting down his bucket into the dark ages, could fetch up for you any amount of rubbish that you might call for, but could even tell you on which side, dexter or sinister, starboard or larboard, the particular page might stand in which he had been angling. Well. I admire Indian jugglers, I look with pleasure on rope-dancers, whether dancing the slack or the tight rope; and I, for one, would not have grudged a subscription of five shillings towards inducing Mag to go through his tricks. But, when all was over, I must still have asked, Now, Mag., with submission, what may be the use of all that? It is a question through which I could never see my way, except that once a glimmering light occurred to me in the following case — Jacob Bryant, a great scholar some fifty years ago,<sup>1</sup> and a dead shot at all mythological questions, had a large and lofty library, to the upper regions of which, where he kept all his cloudy and flighty authors, he was under the necessity of ascending by means of a long ladder. Now, it came to pass that, when Jacob was well stricken in years, and the sight was waxing dim in his eyes, in mounting to his mythological Olympus, whilst midway on this Jacob's ladder, Jacob fell from it; and, by reason of falling from this ladder, Jacob broke his leg; and, by reason of this fracture, Jacob died. Now, it occurs to one that, if Mag had stood at the foot of the ladder, Jacob needed not to have died; for Mag would have told him everything that he could possibly have learned by going aloft. But still, as Jacob (being above eighty) was nearly due to the undertaker, and as we children of earth have contrived to crawl through the better half of the nineteenth century without Jacob, and as, after all, Mag. was not at the foot of the ladder when most wanted, I continue to think that, even if pleading for Mag.'s usefulness before a jury, I must submit to a non-suit.

<sup>1</sup> Antonio Maghabecci, 1633-1714.—M.

But I do not stop there. For else, though useless, Mag.'s talent might seem admirable in the way that magic is admirable. Any intellectual gift whatever, such as Jedediah Buxton's gift of demoniac arithmetic,<sup>2</sup> though not only use less, but perhaps even a curse to its possessor, is worth the tribute of one moment's admiration; it is entitled to a Bravo! though one would scruple to give it an Ancora! On the other hand, as to Mag.'s mode of conjuring, I am now satisfied that it was no talent at all, as the world has hitherto imagined, but simply a cutaneous disease. The man ought to have been cupped and leeches, or treated with tonics. Experto crede I was myself attacked by it some years ago, for my memory is subject to frightful irregularities of spasmodic energy, and it struck me then that corrosive sublimate might be required, if it were any species of psora. But, inclining to try milder remedies at first, I took nitric acid, and finished off with chalybeates. This course of practice, accompanied by violent exercise and sudorifics, succeeded at that time. But I have since felt the virus still lurking in the system; and am at times horribly alarmed at the prospect of turning out a confirmed Maghab; which, in point of misery to the patient, must be the next bad thing to being a vampire.

<sup>1</sup> Jacob Bryant, 1715-1804 —M.

<sup>2</sup> Jedediah Buxton, calculator, born about 1704, died 1775 —M

They knew little of Sir William Hamilton who fancied that his enormous reading tended to any result so barren as this. But other whisperers there were, who would have persuaded me that Sir William was simply a great linguist. Since the time when I first came to know him, Europe has had several monsters of that class, and, amongst others, Cardinal Mezzofanti<sup>1</sup>. Perhaps the cardinal was, on the whole, the greatest of his order. He knew, I believe (so as to speak familiarly), thirty-four languages; whereas a Scandinavian clergyman (Swedish or Norse), who has died since the cardinal, and was reputed to have mastered fifty-six, probably only read them. But what ultimate value attached to this hyperbolical acquisition?<sup>2</sup> If one wrote an

<sup>1</sup> Mezzofanti, 1774-1849 —M.

<sup>2</sup> However, if this camel-load of languages tended to no useful result, it ought in justice to be mentioned that at least it originated in a very useful effort of benignity. One terminus lay in the useful, if the other terminus evaporated in smoke. The army of Napoleon was a polyglot army to a greater extent than is generally known; and, in attending the military hospital-beds at Milan, for the purpose of offering spiritual consolations, the pious monk Mezzofanti is reported to have found three-and-twenty languages indispensable. These being epitaph for his eminence, one might be tempted into saying, "Here lies a man that, in the act of dying, committed a robbery, absconding from his poor fellow-creatures with a valuable polyglot dictionary." Assuredly, any man who puts his treasures into a form which must perish in company with himself is no profound benefactor to his species. Not thus did Sir William proceed, as I soon learned after I made his acquaintance; and the results of his reading are now sown and rooted at Paris, not less than at Berlin; are blossoming on the Rhine; and are bearing fruit on the Danube.

Ah, reader, at this moment I hear the fierce clamours of the press, that speaks through double trumpets of space and time, uttering inexorable edicts and interdicts as to both. Pardon me, therefore, if, by hurrying, I fall into disproportion with myself, or if, in order to hurry, I should find it necessary to be affectedly brief. My own direct acquaintance with Sir William Hamilton soon apprised me that, of all great readers, he was the one to whom it was most indispensable that he should react by his own mind upon what he read. There are different lines of approach upon which a man may force an entrance into the citadels of philosophy. Some read little or nothing. for instance, Kant, who had not (as might be proved) read even Locke—perhaps not one page of Locke—though I fully believe that he would not materially have modified what he has written if by accident he had. He, by blank power, integrated any imperfect hint as to a writer's doctrines that he had picked up casually in conversation or from random reading. But others make their advances by different routes. Sir William Hamilton, when I first knew him, was not properly a philosopher—nor would then have called himself such—but a polyhistor, of a higher class, and with far more combining powers, than Bayle,—having (or taking means to have) a pencyclopædic acquaintance with every section of knowledge wanted for the necessities of conversation, it happened naturally that they were learned radically. He that talks a language cannot deceive himself—[I have heard this jest about Cardinal Mezzofanti from one who knew him. "He knew about fifty languages,—i.e. there were about fifty ways into his head; and, when you got there, you found it empty"—M ]

that could furnish keys for unlocking man's inner nature. Already, in 1814, I conceive that he must have been studying physiology upon principles of investigation suggested by himself. In 1820, 1827, and the following years, up to 1832, on revisiting Edinburgh, I found him master of all the knowledge that France and Germany had then accumulated upon animal magnetism ; which he justly conceived to hide within itself shy secrets as to "the dark foundations" of our human nature, such as cannot now be lawfully neglected—secrets which evidently had gleamed and cropped out at intervals through past ages of the world in various phenomena that were tarnished or were darkened into apparent doubtfulness only by the superstitions that surrounded them. The immensity of Sir William's attainments was best laid open by consulting him (or by hearing him consulted) upon intellectual difficulties, or upon schemes literary and philosophic. Such applications, come from what point of the compass they would, found him always prepared. Nor did it seem to make any difference whether it were the exudition of words or things that was needed. Amongst the books for which I am indebted to his kindness as memorials of his regard, one which I value most is a copy of the Scaligerana, and for this reason, that it is intrinsically a characteristic memento of himself when first I knew him. In the Scaligers, father and son, who were both astonishing men, I fancied this resemblance to himself, that there was the same equilibrium in all three as to thing-knowledge and word-knowledge. Again, Scaliger the elder, as is well known, had been a cavalry officer up to his fortieth year ; and often, in his controversial writings, one deciphers the quondam trooper cutting furiously right and left in a melée. There, also, I fancy a resemblance. now and then, in Sir William's polemics, I seem to trace the sword-arm that charged at Drumclog, or is that story all a dream ?

But that trumpet—both those trumpets again are sounding, and now evidently for the last time ; and it seems to me that, if ever I heard a trumpet in a passion, both of these trumpets are labouring under that infirmity. Ah, what a chaos ! In what confusion and hurry, my reader, shall we part ! I had three hundred things, at least, to say ; and, if that arithmetic is correct, it strikes me as a sad necessity that, for a matter of two hundred and ninety-nine, I must remain in your debt. In debt? Ay; but for how long? When do I mean to pay? Thirty days after date would be almost as good as cash. True, much-injured reader, it would be so; and my wish, were wishes discountable, would run exactly in that channel. But that, alas! is impossible. Harken to the nature of the fix in which I find myself, and say if you ever heard of a worse. Under ordinary circumstances, if one outruns the usual allowance of space, one has but to say at the foot of the paper, To be continued, and all is healed. Any paper may be adjourned from month to month,—true, but not from volume to volume; and, unhappily for me, this very week's number, in which I am now writing, closes a volume. The several monthly divisions of the journal may mosculate, but not the several volumes. If any one volume were allowed to throw out great tap-roots into a succeeding volume, no section of the journal would ever be finished, or capable of being regarded as a separate and independent whole. To purchase any one volume of the INSTRUCTOR might pledge a man to purchasing onwards into the twentieth century, under the pain of else having on his hands a weight of unfinished articles. Rightly, therefore, it has been made a law,<sup>1</sup> that no subject can be carried on by adjournment from volume to volume. Yet, on the other hand, by a necessity not less cogent, the merest silhouette, or Indian-ink sketch in profile, of a philosopher cannot decently evade some notice of his philosophy. Is not Mallet a by-word in literature to this day for having written a life of Lord Bacon in which he remembered that the noble Lord was a chancellor, but unhappily forgot that he was a leader and a revolutionist in philosophy? And did not this hideous oversight of his make people rejoice in his having failed to keep his engagements with the Duchess of Marlborough for writing the life of her lord, since, by parity of blunder, he would carefully have remembered that the Duke had once been a gentleman of the bed-chamber, and had taken a flying leap early in the morning from the bed-room window of Barbara Villiers, but would have forgotten utterly that he commanded at Blenheim, or (which is worse) would have notified it by way of "P.S." among the errata and addenda that would be carefully looked after in the next edition? Here, now, is a necessity on one side that I should do that which on the other side it appears to be a sheer impossibility that I should even attempt. Even the famous sixteen-string Jack would have recoiled a little from such a perplexity. Is there no dodge, sacred or profane, by which it can be met? Yes, on consideration, perhaps, by this which follows:—Volume the fifteenth, it is true, cannot succeed to property in the fourteenth volume. It cannot receive it as an inheritance. But that will not prevent it from holding such property as an original endowment of its own. This article, for instance, cannot prolong its life into another volume, but it may rise again—it may receive a separate birth de novo—in the future volume. What is to hinder me from writing a paper next March, for example, with this title, "On the Contributions of Sir William Hamilton to Philosophy"? Publicly the law of the journal is thus maintained; and yet, in consistency with that law, an opportunity is gained for something nearer to a reasonable estimate of an illustrious man than could have been crowded within three octavo pages.

<sup>1</sup> From which law there is a proper dispensation in the case of papers which, although related by general title, yet in each division branch off in such way as to be always making a new beginning

Here is a man (it will be said by the thoughtful reviewer of his own age) able to have "made the world grow pale" with the enormity of his learned acquisitions, had he been more often confronted with that world, or, when face to face with it, more capable of ostentatious display. Make us understand in what direction his studies have moved: towards what capital objects; with what immediate results; followed by what testimonies of honour from the supreme tribunals in this department of literature; and supported by what evidences or presumption of having impressed lasting changes upon some great aspects of intellectual philosophy.

II

HERE I am, viz. in vol. xv. Never ruffle your own temper, reader, or mine, by asking how, and with what right. I am here. So much is clear, and what you may call a fait accompli. As to saying that, though I am maybe here “de facto,” nevertheless “de jure” I am not so,—that I have no locus standi; that I am an usurper, an intruder; and that any contraband process by which I can have smuggled myself from vol. xiv to this present vol. xv is not of a kind that will bear looking into,—too true, I answer: very few things will bear looking into! In particular, the revolution of 1688-9 will not bear looking into with eyes of philosophic purism. The object of the purist is to effect the devolution of the crown through a smooth lubricated channel known and conformable to old constitutional requisitions; and, if the word “abdicate” could but be established,—formally, were it, or even constructively,—all would run as sweetly as the chronometers of Greenwich. As it is, I grieve to say that there is a deadly hiatus in the harness which should connect the pre-revolutionary and post-revolutionary commonwealths of England. It is not merely a screw that is loose; it is a link that is missing, and no use advertising for it now. But no matter. that is a grief which, being nearly two hundred years old, an extra glass of wine will do much to heal. And in reality I never heard of a man’s meditating suicide because he could not harmonise the facts of our Revolution with its transcendental theory. Yet not the less the human mind does really yearn and sicken after intellectual modes of solution applied to any intellectual intricacy or nodus. Art must thaw the dilemma which art has frozen together: and never yet was there a reader of any sensibility that did not resent with clamorous indignation the removal by apoplexy from a novel or a drama of any impracticable character that ought to have been disposed of agreeably to the providential forecastings of the plot itself, and by the spontaneous evolution of the fable. My own personal embarrassment on this occasion, in effecting a transit or in evading a transit, was of a nature hardly paralleled in literature. I was to write a paper within certain assigned limits,—which paper, by its very subject and the crying necessities of its nature, utterly rebelled against limits. To transfer it (not in part but in mass) to a field of ampler limits, i.e. to another volume, was made impossible by certain arrangements which nailed the accompanying portrait to this punctual spot—to this instant now, and this momentary audience. The biographic record could not be disjoined from the portrait, and the portrait could not be removed from that particular place in that particular volume. But could I not, secondly, content myself with giving part, carrying forward the other parts by adjournment to another volume? No. because that would be establishing a dependency of one volume upon another, contrary to the plan and law of the whole work. But, then, thirdly, at least I might have hyperbolically expanded on the dimensions of that single paper which the fates allowed me to write? No: I could not do that even; for then I must have monopolised the entire train—first, second, and third class—and, in order to do that, I must have booked myself as the one sole passenger in this journal at least three months beforehand.

It is strange to see what mountains of difficulty sometimes melt away before the suggestions of a child. Accipe principium sursus—solved the whole case. What is to hinder me from beginning afresh upon a new foundation in a new volume, and utterly ignoring all that has gone before? I now do so. And what follows is to be viewed as a totally new article, standing on its own basis.

Everybody, I believe, is young at some period of his life, at least one has an old physiological prejudice in that direction. Else, to hear people talk, one must really suppose that there are celebrated persons who are born to old age as to some separate constitutional inheritance. Nobody says “Old Sophocles,” but very many people say “Old Chaucer.” Yet Chaucer was a younger man at his death than Sophocles. But, if not, why should men insist upon one transitory stage or phasis in a long series of changes, as if suddenly and lawfully arrested, to the exclusion of all the rest? Old Chaucer! why, he was also middle-aged Chaucer; he was young Chaucer; he was baby Chaucer. And the earlier distinctions of a man bear as much relation to posterity as his later distinctions. Above all, one is betrayed into such misconceptions when a man carries a false certificate of age in the very name which designates his relationship to one's self. My great-great-grandmother naturally I figured to myself as having a patriarchal beard. Could I think otherwise of one so deeply merged in grandmotherhood? But a portrait of her taken immediately after death represented her as an attractive young woman not quite twenty-three; which it appeared that she really was. And I remember a similar case even still more striking, which occurred in Chester about the year 1803. Some overflowing of the Dee had exposed to view the secrets of the churchyard. Amongst the coffins in the lower tiers was one which contained the corpse of a woman, particularly blooming. According to my first precipitate computation, she might be rated as one hundred and twenty years old; for she had died in Queen Anne's reign (about 1707, I think), and by the plate on the coffin-lid had been twenty-four at the time of death. Yet her face was most blooming, her lips beautifully fresh, and her hair of the loveliest auburn. Ninety-and-three years of the eighteenth century, and two years of the nineteenth, had she spent in the grave; and, adding these ninety-five years of rest to the twenty-four of her (doubtless unresting) life, for a moment I fell into the natural confusion of making her a very, very old woman; and proportionably I wondered at the vernal beauty which had not ceased to adorn her in the wintry grave. This special indulgence to a special beauty had been the gift of a soil preternaturally antiseptic. But, inevitably, the sudden collision of a youthfulness so apparent with an antiquity so historical caused each idea reciprocally to illuminate the other; so that, for a minute or two, until I had distinguished the elements of this antiquity, and had separated the ninety-five years that did not belong to the young woman herself from the twenty-four that did, I struggled with the impossible and contradictory conception of crazy superannuation incarnated in perfect womanly loveliness. Some metaphysical perplexity of this same nature, I observe, besets those who contemplate us, the tenants of a past generation, through the inverted tube of the present.

The Trophonian gloom which they ascribe to us, considered as present antiquities and relics, adheres to the image of the same poor us when traced upwards to our morning period. We that cannot attempt even to smile in this present stage of the world, is it credible that at any stage we can have laughed? Child of incredulity, if not credible, it is certain. "Ginger<sup>1</sup> was hot in the mouth" in those long-past years, and, "because we were virtuous" at that era, not the less there were "ale and cakes." Though transcendental philosophers (ἀεροβατοῦντες) that walked the air, we condescended to sip at times from sublunary liquors; and at odd times it is possible that we even entered into the kingdom of "civilation"

"Civilation! And what may that be?" Look below, reader, into the foot-note, which will explain it<sup>2</sup> Whilst you are studying that, I'll be moving on slowly overhead; and, when you come up from that mine to the upper air, you'll easily overtake me Civilation, or (if you choose to call it so) civilisation, was not a state into which any of us made a regular habit of ascending only at times we did so; and I presume that at such times Sir William Hamilton, being

<sup>1</sup> I presume the reader to be familiar with the passage in Shakspere here referred to. But, if not, let him look to "Twelfth Night."

<sup>2</sup> And what state may that be? As the word is a valuable word, and in some danger of being lost, I beg to rehearse its history. The late Dr Maginn, with whom some of us may otherwise have had reason to quarrel, was, however, a man of varied accomplishments,—a wit, with singular readiness for improvising, and with very extensive scholarship. Amongst the peculiar opinions which he professed was this—that no man, however much he might tend towards civilisation, was to be regarded as having absolutely reached its apex until he was drunk. Previously to which consummation, a man might be a promising subject for civilisation, but otherwise than in posse it must be premature, so he must be considered as more or less of a savage. This doctrine he naturally published more loudly than ever as he was himself more and more removed from all suspicion of barbaric sobriety. He then became anxious, with tears in his eyes, to proclaim the deep sincerity of his conversion to civilisation. But, as such an odiously long word must ever be distressing to a gentleman taking his ease of an evening, unconsciously, perhaps, he abridged it always after 10 P.M. into civilation. Such was the genesis of the word. And I therefore, upon entering it in my neological dictionary of English, matriculated it thus—"Civilation, by ellipsis, or more properly by syncope, or, rigorously speaking, by luccup, from civilisation."

thoroughly social, would keep us company. From the circumstances given, I infer a probability. Else I protest against "peaching," and revealing secrets, small or great, though forty years old. The range of time which is concerned in my present notice stretches over a dozen years; within which space intermittingly, as off and on I happened to be in Edinburgh, various persons, variously interesting, entered for a time, or quitted for a time, our fluctuating circle. The original nucleus had been John Wilson (i.e. the Wilson) and his brothers,—amongst whom the naturalist (James Wilson) was known to me first,—and subsequently Sir William Hamilton. Next, and after the war had finally reached its consummation in Waterloo—a peripeteia as perfect and dramatic as ever was exhibited on the stage of Athens—others at intervals gladdened our festal company: amongst whom, as the most memorable, I ought to mention Colonel Mitchell, the biographer of Wallenstein, so advantageously known by his bold and original views upon strategies, upon the efficacy of the bayonet, and upon the critical interpretation of some capital chapters in martial history, Captain Thomas Hamilton, the brother of Sir William, an accomplished man, latterly known amongst us by the name of Cyril Thornton, from the title of his novel, Sir William Allan, the distinguished artist, afterwards President of the Royal Scottish Academy; and, lastly, Mr. R. P. Gillies, the advocate, whose name I repeat with a sigh of inexpressible sadness, such as belongs of right to some splendid Timon of Athens, so often as on the one hand I revivify to my mind his gay saloons, resonant with music and festal laughter—the abode for years of a munificent hospitality, which Wordsworth characterised as "all but princely"—and, on the other hand, shudder at the mighty shadows of calamity, of sorrow, of malice, of detraction, that have for thirty years stalked after his retreating splendours, and long since have swallowed up the very memory of his pretensions from the children of this generation <sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Robert Pearce Gillies, born 1788, was admitted to the Scottish Bar in 1815, and for the next ten years was one of the most shining figures in the literary society of Edinburgh. Ruined by the commercial crash of 1825, he removed to London, where he died in 1858,

But, returning to the subject of civilation, could it be said of Sir William Hamilton that he favoured it or promoted it? Hardly, I think. The age itself—that generation of Waterloo—sanctioned a certain degree of civilation in young and old. and Sir William, in his fervid youth, was too social and too generous to retreat austere within the circle of absolute barbarism. But it would have been difficult to civilise him effectually, such was the resistance opposed to civilation by his extraordinary muscular strength. Sir William's powers, in some directions, as an athlete, were indeed unusually great, and would have attracted much more notice, had he not, upon all his personal endowments, been so systematically shy, and even so disdainful of display. Nobody, therefore, fancied that he could gratify Sir William by recalling gymnastic feats of his. When he relaxed at all from his habitual mood of freezing contempt for all personal acts of ostentation whatever (no matter whether intellectual or physical), it was in pure overmastering sympathy with the spirit of genial fun—the amabilis insania—which some special gathering of youth and youthful gaiety had concurred to kindle. It was in mere deference to the expectations or wishes of others that Sir William could be ever persuaded into a moment's display, and then not without an expression of scorn too palpable for his own compliance. A person worse qualified than myself for recording the exact extent of his athletic powers cannot be imagined, and for the plain reason—that, having not the slightest pretensions in that way myself, I had not cultivated any interest in such powers, nor consequently any knowledge of their nature or limits. Ignorant I was of the human frame, and of its latent powers, as regarded speed, force, ambidexterity, in a degree that would have been inexcusable in an old woman. I was even proud of my own desperate ignorance to an extent that made penitence or amendment apparently hopeless. And the worst feature of my barbarism was, and is to this hour, that, instead of meditating occasionally on the possibility that I might be wrong, and the world might be right—on the contrary, with a stiff-neckedness (surely there is such a word) that is truly criminal, I then did, and I now do, exhaust myself in terms of bloody contempt for all the men, and all the races of men, that ever fell down in prose or verse to worship the idol of human physical excellence. "The abject villains!" was the best term (how illiberal!) that I could afford to the ancient Greeks, when noticing their beastly admiration of good running, good wrestling, good cab-driving at Olympia. Oh, heavens! that a fist, that a foot, that a hoof, should be viewed with a holy homage, such as belonged of right to a revelation of truth, or after a millennium of darkness that belonged to the first-fruits of the rising dawn! The Romans, it is remarkable, had no reverence for individual physical prowess. They had no Olympic contests. On the contrary, they regarded all such animal exertions as mere gladiatorial glories, i.e. as the distinctions of slaves, and distinctions that were to be bought for copper and silver amongst the savages of earth. But the Greeks, who, with the tremulous and half-effeminate temperament of genius, combined a hideous defect of dignity and moral stamina, figure as perfect lunatics in their admiration of animal excellence:—

after many years of misfortune. His Memoirs of a Literary Veteran, published in 1851, contain his Edinburgh recollections.—M.

"Metaque ferivdis
Evitata rotis, palmaque nobilis,
Terrarum dominos evehit ad deos."

Horace himself, roué as he was, is Roman enough to squint at his reader with a look half-aghast at this extravagance of descent into the superstition that glorifies the fleshly Homer, the greatest master of traumatic surgery (æ the philosophy of wounds) that has ever existed,—in fact (if it were not for his profound darkness on the subject of gunshot wounds) the only poet on record that would, sede vacante, have been elected by acclamation, without needing any interest at all or any canvass, as house-surgeon to St. Thomas's Hospital, or the Hotel Dieu,—has absolutely left nothing for posterity to do in what regards the description of wounds, ulcers, &c. That department of surgery has become a mere sinecure since the first edition of the Iliad. But in Milton, raised above Homer as heaven is raised above earth, who can tolerate the grovelling ambition of angels glorying in "a noble stroke"?<sup>1</sup> To have delivered a "facer," or a backhanded blow, or to have cut St George with a broadsword over the conk of an archangel—ah, faugh! who can blame me for being sick? Is it I, or is it Milton, that is in the wrong? At all events, reader, justifying these things, never dream yourself entitled to join the wretched and effeminate abusers of boxing, of the ring, of the fancy, as now languishing in England. How brutal, you pretend to say, is that savage practice in the London ring of thumping the human face divine into the semblance of a roasted apple dressed with a poultice! Doubtless. But, even as it is, you that laud the traumatic sagacities of Homer, and even of the heaven-born Milton, presume not to talk of brutality in that which carried glory and illustration amongst the heavenly host. To "fib" a man, to "punish" him, to "draw his claret," or to get his cocoa-nut into "chancery," cannot be so thoroughly unworthy of a bargeman, or the Tipton Slasher, if it's quite becoming to a Grecian Milo, or a Phrygian Entellus, or even—horresco referens—not beneath a Miltonic seraph.

Sir William Hamilton's prowess did not exhibit itself in that line. Professor Wilson had thumped his way to consideration; he had also walked and run into fame. But standing leaps it was—leaps upward without any advantage of a run—in which Sir W.'s pre-eminence was illustrated. Even me, cased against foolish admiration in seven-fold ignorance, they startled and astonished—me even, though resolutely bent upon despising every pretension of that class, and the more so at that time because Wordsworth had then recently shocked me beyond expression by a confession that seemed inhuman in its degradation, viz this—that, whereas he would not walk for a quarter of a mile to see the man whom all the world should agree to crown as its foremost intellectual champion, willingly he would go three days' journey through a wilderness to see Belzoni!<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> "So saying, a noble stroke he lifted high,
Which hung not, but so swift with tempest fell
On the proud crest of Satan that no sight,
Nor motion of swift thought, less could his shield,
Such rum intercept"

Paradise Lost, vi. 189-193—M.

<sup>2</sup> Belzoni [1778-1823], it may be necessary to inform this genera

But stop. This will not do. I must alter the scale of this paper, or else—something will happen which would vex me. The artist who sketched the Vicar of Wakefield's family group, in his zeal for comprehensive fulness of details, enlarged his canvas until he forgot the narrow proportions of the good vicar's house; and the picture, when finished, was too big to enter the front-door of the vicarage. One side of the house must have been pulled down to allow of its introduction; and, as a natural consequence, the picture was consigned to a barn—which fate will be mine, unless an instant remedy can be applied to the desultory and expansive tendencies which besiege all personal sketches, and especially sketches of such men as, being largely philosophic, and controversially entangled in the questions of their own generation, stand in a possible relation to all things. A dangerous subject is a philosopher. For, even if he has not formally and broadly entangled himself controversially in the moving disputes of his age, be assured that up and down his writings will be detected hooks and eyes lurking more or less obscurely, that are fitted to infibulate him (or perhaps meant to infibulate him) into the great draperies and arras of the philosophical speculations hanging down to coming generations. "Hooks and eyes!" Is not that image strictly a plagiarism from some respectable tailor and habit-maker? Perhaps it is; but infibulate cannot be a plagiarism, because I never saw the word before; and, in fact, I have this moment invented it, in order to express an extra interest in the subject.

The embarrassment is this: I must have some amusement for my reader. Can I have it? Is it to be looked for from any region of philosophic speculation? The reader has shown himself a patient reader—he has waited: and I must tion, was an Italian, who came to Liverpool originally in the character of a posture-master, an acrobates, a walker on the tight-rope, a desultor, &c. He ran towards seven feet high, was as strong as a camel, and as agile as a horse. But he was also a very intelligent man, and subsequently his ambition received a higher direction. Under English patronage, he explored the tombs of Egyptian Thebes, gave a rude shaking to the mummies, who had slept quite long enough, and amongst the Arabs, Nubians, &c., but especially amongst Turks, who have a childish reverence for physical perfections, turned his fine person to a real diplomatic use in the service of England.

reward him I must "take a rise" out of something or other and nothing that connects itself with Sir W. H. is so likely to furnish it as the old-world superannuated manuals of Logic

One-half of Sir William's laurels have been won in the fields of logic ; and a better way there cannot be for doing justice to the reforms (whether of extension or of purification) which we owe and shall owe to Sir William than that which lies through any fair and lively abstract of the unreformed manuals, such as have prevailed all over Europe for the last three centuries. Lively seems a strange epithet for the characterising of a "Logic." But, in fact, from pure misconception of their appropriate functions, the ordinary books of logic had gradually come to trespass more and more upon the regular province of Joe Miller. Here follow, for the reader's entertainment, a few of their most classical cases :—

(1) Protagoras had instructed Euathlus in the art of judicial pleading, and upon these terms,—that the stipulated fee for this instruction should not be paid by the pupil until he came to plead his first cause, and then only in the event of his winning it. Having finished his education, however, Euathlus showed no intention of fulfilling the contract by applying his knowledge practically, and Protagoras, as the best mode of forcing him to do so, raised a suit against him for the money. The pleadings were opened by the plaintiff, who argued that it was very little matter how the court decided the case, since under any possible decision the result must practically be for himself—"Because," said he, "if you the judges decide in my favour, then I gain my cause by that decision, but, on the other hand, if you decide against me, then it is true that, forensically, I lose the cause, but in that case Euathlus gains it, and it is his first cause. Now, the very agreement was that, if he gained his first cause, he should pay me instantly." On the other side, the defendant smilingly retorted upon him his own line of argument "In any case," said Euathlus, "I am destined to win ; for, if the court decides in my favour, there is an end of the matter. I am absolved from paying by the highest legal authority. But, if the court makes its award in favour of the learned gentleman, my antagonist, then I shall have lost the cause ; and that is precisely the case in which it was agreed between us that I was not to pay." The knavish Athenian in search of a dinner (Græculus esuviens) who manufactured this pretty conundrum of litigation flattered himself that he had got both parties into a deadly fix, out of which they could not stir backwards or forwards. But the summary solution of the dilemma is this : 1st, That at any rate it is not a dilemma within the jurisdiction of logic ; 2d, that, as a forensic dilemma, it might read prettily in the schools, but not in the forum : since the real nodus of the perplexity lies in this—that each party alternately shelters himself under the shadow of a double law—when the one law fails him, he runs under the shadow of the other, and vice versa. But in a case of actual life the parties must previously have made their election of the law by which they would be tried, and, once having done this, neither party would be at liberty to upset the decision of the court by the specific terms of the agreement, nor reciprocally to upset the specific agreement by the authority of the court

(2) Another well-known case of perplexity, falsely classed as logical, is that denominated "The Crocodile." I recall at this moment a little metrical tale of Southey's, in which the dramatis personæ are pretty nearly the same, viz a crocodile, a woman, and her son. In that case, however, the crocodile is introduced as a person of pattern morality, for the woman says of him—

"The king of the crocodiles never does wrong :
He has no tail so stiff and strong Petitioners to sweep away,<sup>1</sup>
But he has ears to hear what I say."

Not so the crocodile known to the Greek dialecticians He bore a very different character. If he had no tail to interfere with Magna Charta and the imprescriptible right of petitioning, he had, however, teeth of the most horrid description for crushing petition and petitioner into one indistinguishable pulp ; and, in the particular case contemplated by the

<sup>1</sup> Forgetting this particular line, I have coined one, in order to fill up the chasm as to sense and metre.

logicians, having made prisoner of a poor woman's son, he was by her charged with the same purpose in regard to her beloved cub as the Cyclops in the "Odyssey" avows in regard to Ulysses, viz. that he reserved him to his larder for an extra bonne bouche on a gala-day. The crocodile, who, generally speaking, is the most uncandid of reptiles, would not altogether deny the soft impeachment; but, in order to sport an air of liberality which was far from his heart, he protested that, no matter for any private views which he might have dallied with in respect to the young gentleman, he would abandon them all on one condition (but, observe, a condition which he privately held to be impossible for a woman to fulfil), viz. that she should utter some proposition which was incontrovertibly true. The woman mused upon this, for, though she knew of propositions that no neutral party could dispute—as this, for instance, that crocodiles are the most odious of vermin—it was evident that her antagonist would repel that as an illiberal and one-sided personality. After some consideration, therefore, she replied thus,—“You will eat my son.” There and then arose in the crocodile's brain a furious self-conflict, from which it is contended that no amount of Athenian chicanery could ever deliver him, since, if he did eat her son, then the woman had uttered the plain truth, which the crocodile himself could not have the face to deny; in which case (the case of speaking truth) he had pledged his royal word not to eat him: and thus he had acted in a way to make the word of a crocodile, or his bond, or even the tears of a crocodile, a mere jest amongst philosophers. On the other hand, if, in contemplation of these horrid consequences, he did not eat her son, then the woman had uttered a falsehood in asserting that he would, and it became a royal duty in him, as a guardian of morality, to exact the penalty of her wickedness. Here, however, as so commonly in the case of diplomatic treaties, when the secret object is to leave a nest-egg towards a future war as soon as war shall become convenient, the original error lay in not having exhausted the circle of possibilities,—that is, in having provided for two out of three cases, but not for the third. Truth absolute was provided for; in that case the son was to be spared. Absolute falsehood was also provided for; in that case the son was to die. But truth conditional was not provided for. Supposing the woman to say something contingent on a case that might or might not be realised, then it became necessary to wait for the event. But here there was no use in waiting, since, whichever of the two possible events should occur, either equally and irretrievably landed the crocodile in a violation of his royal promise.

(3) Another and much more famous perplexity, paraded by the Greek logicians, was that known by the title of "Achilles and the Tortoise." None better illustrates the erroneous and vague conceptions which they (and universally which the popular understanding) formed of logic and its proper jurisdiction. For the sake of many who will never have heard of it, and for the sake of the metaphysical solution which it has since suggested to some original thinkers, I will here rehearse it.—Achilles, most of us know, is celebrated in the "Iliad" as the swift-footed ( $\pi\rho\delta\alpha\varsigma \acute{\omega}\kappa\iota\varsigma$  'Αχιλλεύς); and the tortoise, perhaps all of us know, is equally celebrated amongst naturalists as the slow-footed. In any race, therefore, between such parties, according to the equities of Newmarket and Doncaster, where artificial compensations as to the weight of the riders are used to redress those natural advantages that would else be unfair, Achilles must grant to the tortoise the benefit of starting first. But, if he does that, says the Greek sophist, then I, the sophist, back the tortoise to any amount, engaging that the goddess-born hero shall never come up with the poor reptile. Let us see. It matters little what exact amount of precedency is conceded to the tortoise, but say that he is allowed a start of one-tenth part of the whole course. Quite as little does it matter by what ratio of speed Achilles surpasses the tortoise; but, suppose this ratio to be that of ten to one, then, if the racecourse be ten miles long, our friend the slow-coach, being by the conditions entitled to one-tenth of the course for his starting allowance, will have finished one mile as a solo performer before Achilles is entitled to move. When the duet begins, the tortoise will be entering on the second mile precisely as Achilles enters on the first. But, because the Nob runs ten times as fast as the Snob, whilst Achilles is running his first mile the tortoise accomplishes only the tenth-part of the second mile. Not much, you say. Certainly not very much, but quite enough to keep the reptile in advance of the hero. This hero, being very little addicted to think small beer of himself, begins to fancy that it will cost him too trivial an effort to run ahead of his opponent. But don't let him shout before he is out of the wood. For, though he soon runs over that tenth of a mile which the tortoise has already finished, even this costs him a certain time, however brief. And during that time the tortoise will have finished a corresponding sub-section of the course—viz the tenth-part of a tenth-part. This fraction is a hundredth-part of the total distance. Trifle as that is, it constitutes a debt against Achilles, which debt must be paid. And, whilst he is paying it, behold our dull friend in the shell has run the tenth-part of a hundredth-part, which amounts to a thousandth-part. To the goddess-born what a flea-bite is that! True, it is so; but still it lasts long enough to give the tortoise time for keeping his distance, and for drawing another little bill upon Achilles for a ten-thousandth part. Always, in fact, alight upon what stage you will of the race, there is a little arrear to be settled between the parties, and always against the hero. “Verum, in account with the divine and long-legged Pelides, Cr. by one-billionth or one-decillionth of the course”: much or little, what matters it, so long as the divine man cannot pay it off before another instalment becomes due? And pay it off he never will, though the race should last for a thousand centuries. Here, now, was a Gordian knot which never could be untied—viz that A should be confessedly ten times fleetier than B, and yet through all ages be unable to get ahead of him. But, in fact, though baffling to the popular understanding, the problem does not turn upon any logical difficulty; the difficulty is purely mathematical, and the same as is involved in a certain familiar case of decimal fractions, namely, in a repeating decimal, such as this—Throw the vulgar fraction of 2 divided by 3 into the form of a decimal, and it will become six-tenths + six-hundredths + six-thousandths, &c. (.66666, &c., inexhaustibly to all eternity). It is, in fact, a pure mathematic or ideal case made perplexing by being incarnated in a case of physical experience. In other words, it is one amongst the many confounding consequences which may be deduced from the endless divisibility of space. But (as more than one subtle thinker has noticed) even this perplexity, as regards the practical antinomy (viz. the demonstrability on the one side that Achilles never can overtake the tortoise, and yet on the other side the certainty from experience that he will) is supported only by pursuing the expansion of one infinite (viz. space subdividing itself) and concealing the compensatory expansion of another infinite—viz. time subdividing itself. The infinity of space in this race of subdivision is artfully run against a finite time; whereas, if the one infinite were pitted, as in reason it ought to be, against the other infinite, the endless divisibility of time against the endless divisibility of space, there would arise a reciprocal exhaustion and neutralisation that would swallow up the astounding consequences, very much as the two Kilkenny cats ate up each other. Or, as Leibnitz explains the problem to M. Foucher, in a passage called into notice by Mrs. Coleridge, “Ne craignez point, monsieur, la tortue que les Pyrrhoniens faisaient aller aussi vite qu’Achille. Un espace divisible sans fin se passe dans un tems aussi divisible sans fin.”<sup>1</sup> That is, a space that is infinitely subdivisible (and which, therefore, seems to us an abyss that never could be traversed in a finite time) is traversed without difficulty in a time that is also infinitely divisible

III

In the case of Achilles and the Tortoise, and many others, there were concerned great metaphysical problems, and elementary perplexities, such as never cease to awaken and to interest the human mind under any condition of human development. Such questions wear always an air of permanent involution in the understanding, and the challenge is, not to their claim upon human interest, but to their privilege of intrusion upon the field of logic. As misplaced, you reasonably protested against many of these speculations, but not as in themselves trivial or wanting in philosophic importance. Too often, on the other hand, mere tricks of verbal legerdemain, fantastic snares for puzzling the understanding by means of the equivocalities that lurk in language, entered largely into the popular books of logic, not rising in the quality of their interest at all above the level of rope-dancing and thimblerrigging. Here, for instance, is an illustrative case, that has been adopted into many manuals of logic, and apparently much admired:—A great philosopher pronounces the people of Crete, one and all, liars. But this great philosopher, whose name is Epimenides, happens himself to be a Cretan. On his own showing, therefore, Epimenides is a liar. But, if so, what he says is a lie. Now, what he says is that the Cretans are liars. This, therefore, as coming from a liar, is a lie, and the Cretans, as is now philosophically demonstrated, are all persons of honour and veracity. Consequently, Epimenides is such. You may depend upon everything that he says. But what he says most frequently is that all the Cretans are liars. Himself, therefore, as one amongst them, he denounces as a liar. Being such, he has falsely taxed the Cretans with falsehood, and himself amongst them. It is false, therefore, that Epimenides is a liar. Consequently, in calling himself by implication a liar, as one amongst the Cretans, he lied. And the proof of his veracity rests in his having lied. And so on de capo for ever and ever.

<sup>1</sup> See Appended Note at the end of this Paper for a further discussion of this famous puzzle of Achilles and the Tortoise, and of the reference made to Leibnitz in connexion with it by Mrs. Sara Coleridge.—M.

A more pleasant example of the same logical see-saw occurs in the sermons<sup>1</sup> of Jeremy Taylor. "That man," says the inimitable bishop, "was prettily and fantastically troubled, who, having used to put his trust in dreams, one night dreamed that all dreams were vain, for he considered, if so, then this was vain, and the dreams might be true for all this. (For who pronounced them not true, except a vain dream?) But, if they might be true, then this dream might be so upon equal reason. And then dreams were vain, because this dream, which told him so, was true; and so round again. In the same circle runs the heart of man. All his cogitations are vain, and yet he makes especial

<sup>1</sup> Viz. in the sermon entitled The Decentfulness of the Heart, p 515, vol. 1, in Longman's edition of the Sermons, 1826.

“ use of this—that that thought which thinks so, that is vain
“ And, if that be vain, then his other thoughts, which are “ vainly declared so, may be real and relied upon.” You see, reader, the horrid American fix into which a man is betrayed, if he obeys the command of a dream to distrust dreams universally, for then he has no right to trust in this particular dream which authorises his general distrust. No ; let us have fair play. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. And this ugly gander of a dream, that “notes” and “protests” all dreams collectively, silently and by inevitable consequence notes and protests itself.

So natural, indeed, to the morbid activity of man are these revolving forms of alternate repulsion, where flight turns suddenly into pursuit, and pursuit into flight, that I myself, when a schoolboy, invented several : this, for instance, which once puzzled a man in a wig ; and I believe he bore me malice to his dying day, because he gave up the ghost, by reason of fever, before he was able to find out satisfactorily what screw was loose in my logical conundrum ; and thus, in fact, “all along of me” (as he expressed it) the poor man was forced to walk out of life re infecta, his business unfinished, the one sole problem that had tortured him being unsolved. It was this.—Somebody had told me of a dealer in gin who, having had his attention roused to the enormous waste of liquor caused by the unsteady hands of drunkards, invented a counter which, through a simple set of contrivances, gathered into a common reservoir all the spillings that previously had run to waste. St. Monday, as it was then called in English manufacturing towns, formed the jubilee day in each week for the drunkards ; and it was now ascertained (i. e. subsequently to the epoch of the artificial counter) that oftentimes the mere “spilth”<sup>1</sup> of St. Monday supplied the entire demand of Tuesday. It struck me, therefore, on reviewing this case, that the more the people drank, the more they would titubate ; by which word it was that I expressed the reeling and stumbling of intoxication. If they drank abominably, then of course they would titubate abomi-nably ; and, titubating abominably, inevitably they would spill in the same ratio. The more they drank, the more they would titubate ; the more they titubated, the more they would spill ; and the more they spilt, the more, it is clear, they did not drink. You can't tax a man with drinking what he spills. It is evident, from Euclid, that the more they spilt, the less they could have to drink. So that, if their titubation was excessive, then their spilling must have been excessive, and in that case they must have practised almost total abstinence. Spilling nearly all, how could they have left themselves anything worth speaking of to drink ? Yet, again, if they drank nothing worth speaking of, how could they titubate ? Clearly they could not ; and, not titubating, they could have had no reason for spilling, in which case they must have drunk the whole—that is, they must have drunk to the whole excess imputed, which doing, they were dead drunk, and must have titubated to extremity ; which doing, they must have spilt nearly the whole. Spilling the whole, they could not have been drunk. Ergo, could not have titubated. Ergo, could not have spilt. Ergo, must have drunk the whole. Ergo, were dead drunk. Ergo, must have titubated. “And so round again,” as my lord the bishop pleasantly expresses it, in secula seculorum.

<sup>1</sup> A Shakesperian word see Timon of Athens. The contrivance of the spirit-dealer is now universally diffused, but in those days it was only beginning.

It is not easy to state adequately the condition of Logic when overrun by a vegetation of weeds like those which I have described. The extent of the mischief would not be measured by saying that the culture of the ancient vineyard had languished. Much better it would describe the case to say that the culture had gradually been transferred to a growth of alien plants, having no relation or even resemblance to the vine, nor any tendency towards a common purpose with the vine. Logic had silently become not so much a superannuated speculation that was exhibited in decay, as a new and intrusive speculation that masquerades under an ancient name. And, undoubtedly, had it not been for the inveterate traditions of logic, which maintained their ground by means of names—had it not been for the hereditary necessities, which kept open a section by a sort of dull prescription for sylogism, for definition, for division, for dilemma, for sorites, &c.—but for this accident, the very last links that connected the modern systems of logic with the original Aristotelian system would probably have perished. The heterogeneity of the materials dealt with in modish books of logic was gradually making itself more and more conspicuous. This taint had long been felt obscurely; the next step would naturally have been to brighten that feeling to the consciousness; after which the final step would be to restore its homogeneous character to the science, by separating the two incoherent elements, and by expelling one or the other of them. But which, whether the true or the intrusive, no man can doubt who has watched the set of the currents in our ordinary and popular philosophy—the philosophy which recommends itself to the children of our own generation. And thus, to a dead certainty, had not such a consummation been intercepted by a splendid accident, the last stage in the history of Logic must have been to ignore every distinguishable atom and fibre that continued to connect logic with anything whatever that had originally been called or understood by that name.

The splendid accident was the critical appearance of a great man—viz Immanuel Kant.<sup>1</sup> He it was (and how comes it that a reviewer of Logical Revolutions so able as Mr Spencer Baynes should have dropped such a fact from his record ?)—he it was that authoritatively recalled Logic to its proper duties as a formal science. In that sense, and to that extent—viz. simply in relation to the corruptions worked or completed by his own century—Kant was an innovator. He was an innovator by virtue of rejecting innovation. He had credit for a novelty, because he called back an antiquity; but in reality, whatever might be the openings which he made elsewhere, for going ahead and for doing or enabling to do something which should merit to be marked with the affirmative sign, the sign of plus (+), certainly, as regarded this special science which we are now speaking of, viz. Logic, he contented himself with cleansing the general field, and removing accumulations, whether of mere unsightly rubbish<sup>1</sup> or of downright obstruction. He built nothing. simply, as an active Roman edile, he pulled down the irregular and lawless erections that preoccupied the serviceable areas where truth might pitch her tents, or that encroached upon the ancient paths along which the plain upright man might see his way into the centre of those tents

<sup>1</sup> I do not mean that, failing Kant, there have not been, since his rising in 1755-80, other potent minds capable of the same service, and eventually that service would have been achieved by somebody. A treason of that magnitude to a capital interest of the human intellect secretly lodges at the time a promise and a deep assurance of a full and faithful reaction. But still, if the great impulse given to thought, and the direction impressed upon it, by Kant, had been wanting, how many of our great European thinkers since the French Revolution might have been intercepted, and how long would have been the syncope under which the life-blood of philosophy might have stagnated!

Kant not only volunteered no extensions that I am aware of to the great Crystal Palace of Logic, with the single exception (not yet practically adopted) of the judicia infinita (or limitantia), as furnishing a basis for the arrondissement of his own categories; but, moreover, he seems systematically to have questioned the possibility of making any real additions to the edifice as left by Aristotle. Kant, therefore, in effect, bequeathed carte blanche on this subject to the generations that should succeed him.

But carte blanche is not a thing to be thankful for, unless you know of something to write upon it that may occupy the blank. If not, it is a standing reproach to your poverty; for who would have said "thank ye" for a gift of Chat Moss, unless he had happened also to possess those three million cart-loads of rubbish that were found necessary to fill its insatiable maw, and to reconcile its feelings to the torture of railway locomotives rushing and snorting, day and night, between Manchester and Liverpool?

There are not many people who can boast of having made discoveries in Logic; for the simplicity of so elementary a speculation presents at any period not very much of what can properly be made the subject of discovery. The field is not fertile, and what little it yields is soon carried off by the earliest reapers But, in spite of the difficulties, Sir William has been a discoverer. He has drawn into open daylight so much of ancient hints that were but dimly shadowed out, strengthening their outlines, and exposing the intellectual necessity in which they had their roots, that even so far he might have merited something of that gratitude which is conceded to the earliest explorers of truth. And, apart from these cases, there are others in which unequivocally he is the very first revealer of what had lurked unsuspected even to the most superstitious searchers of Aristotle's text. All the history of letters does not present us with so remarkable a detection of an error, that had hidden itself for a couple of thousand years, as that made by Sir William in the Aristotelian use of the term categorical. There has been many a man that would have risked his life upon the certainty that Aristotle had employed this word as the antithesis of hypothetic whereas it now appears that, although corrupted into that sense by the very earliest interpreters of the Organon, it is not once so employed by Aristotle. The new doctrine upon the Quantification of the Predicate belongs in part to Sir William—viz in its extension to negative propositions A distinguished pupil of Sir William's has recently made it public,<sup>1</sup> and partially it had been published previously in the double controversy which it had fastened upon its author The value of it lies, I believe, chiefly in the integration which it gives to the theory of logic, and everything is valuable on that path, so long as any darkness lingers upon it. The important distinction between the extension and the comprehension, as marking two alternate wholes involved in a syllogism, is in part a restoration, but a restoration which owes its improvement (using that word in a sense confined to the pulpit—viz. as an adaptation of a thing to the necessities of practice) to Sir William The material glimpses into these innovations had dawned upon him, it now appears, so early as 1833 But, several years before that date, I myself can testify that Sir William was looking with a sceptical jealousy into the old traditional notions that had become obstinate fixtures in the received books of logic. He it was—and certainly before 1820—that first threw light upon a very interesting point that had perplexed me for years. Somewhere in the Rhetoric of Aristotle, I had, with secret astonishment, observed him speaking of the enthymeme as having some special relation to the purposes of the orator<sup>1</sup>. Yet how? Simply that it abridged the syllogism—doubtless fitted it better for popular use. But that was a matter of course; and Aristotle, it was clear, meant more than that. Next came across me, in some Greek expounder of Aristotle, the expression of ῥητορικὸν σύλλογισμον, rhetorical syllogisms; which certainly could not point to a mere accident of ellipsis, but to some special differentiation as to the matter of the particular syllogism appropriated to the orator. Sir William Hamilton it was that threw the first ray of light into my perplexity by a little essay of Facciolati's on this very point. Subsequently, I learned from Sir William that a sort of controversy had existed at one time upon this particular question of the sense attaching to this special use of the word enthymeme. In those years, I entertained a private intention of publishing a translation (but largely altered for English use) of Lambert's Organon.<sup>2</sup> It had seemed to me a sort of encyclopædia on the whole world of subjects connected with Logic. From its great compass and variety, I had found it a most amusing book; and I need not say that Lambert, the friend and correspondent of Kant, could not be otherwise than instructive. My intention was to connect with this work a supplement containing everything that bore upon Logic of a revolutionary character, and suggesting either changes or doubts,—no matter whether orthodox or heterodox, so long as it was but interesting; and, amongst the jewels of this appendix, I relied upon this essay of Facciolati,<sup>1</sup> for I knew that it was of a nature to create a lively interest amongst scholars. However, my Lambert never made its appearance in this world, nor will perhaps; and in the meantime Sir William has expanded his own knowledge of this enthymeme dispute in a way that greatly reduces the value of Facciolati's particular contribution, and places Sir William himself on the central station of authority in the controversy, as the first person who has reviewed the whole of it, and abstracted the relations to each other of the several stages through which it passed. There is, indeed, I am disposed to think, no great question that has ever connected itself with Logic which Sir William Hamilton has not glanced at, with more or less of circumstantiality, according to its importance: except, perhaps, this one—viz. the dependency of geometrical propositions on the direct machinery of the syllogism. Once only I have observed him to look in that direction<sup>2</sup> On that single occasion, I saw with surprise what seemed an insinuation that is utterly irreconcilable with any theory of the case that I can understand.

<sup>1</sup> Accordingly, he made war not only upon those material adulterations of logic which clouded and perplexed the truth, but also upon those formal refinements which did no more than disfigure the truth, as, for example, upon the spurious subtlety (die falsche spitzfindigkeit) of the fourth figure.

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Thomas Spencer Baynes, whose Essay on the New Analytic of Logical Forms, expounding Sir William Hamilton's new logical doctrine of the Quantification of the Predicate, was published in 1850. He was afterwards Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of St Andrews, and editor of the latest edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica; and he died in May 1887.—M

<sup>1</sup> The reader must keep in mind that, whilst the Roman distinguished between the Orator and the Rhetorician, the Grecian expressed both by the same word; and the distinction,—which, though not practically developed so much in Athens as in Rome, must have existed (for such men as Isocrates were but chamber orators),—perished to the Greek, as happens with many a distinction, for pure want of an expression.

<sup>2</sup> Johann Heinrich Lambert (1728-1777). His Organon was published in 1764.—M.

Meantime, what the public misses chiefly, and still looks for with hope from the hands of Sir William Hamilton, is a comprehensive treatise on every part of Logic, adapted to the growing necessities of the times; for, after satire has done its worst, and the malice is exhausted which fastens with such genial bitterness on the errors or infirmities of our own times, I cannot but feel a steady persuasion that this age is labouring with a deeper fermentation of thought and self-questioning than has ever before reached the general heart of a nation. In such circumstances, a Logic like that of the Jansenists does not move a step in advance towards any real want of the times. To be free by comparison from some gross errors and impertinences that disfigure the bulk of Logics, is not any positive service rendered to the struggling intellect that everywhere is seeking clamorously a discipline of art to guide its efforts towards the free movement of its powers. It is not a sound logic that is wanted, so much as a potent and life-giving logic—not a logic whose merit is simply to keep the right road, and, so far, as guaranteed against misleading, but a logic that will break down obstructions and impediments such as make even the right road impassable.

<sup>1</sup> The lexicographer Jacopo Facciolati (1682-1769) was Professor of Logic in Padua; and a volume of his Latin Discourses or Essays, published at Padua in 1752, contains one "Ad Dialecticam" and another "De Dialecticæ ac Rhetoricæ Differentia"—M.

<sup>2</sup> A direction in which Reid faltered, and in effect made shipwreck—viz. in the paper on the Organon which he contributed to Lord Kames's Sketches of Men. [Sketches of the History of Man. 1774.—M.]

To sketch the outline of such a Logic, and to show that the sketcher was not under any confusion as to the proper functions of Logic, would require a separate paper. The great difficulty which besets it, and which might repel from such a service men of the highest faculties, is that it presupposes a long preparation and vigilance in noting as they arise the innumerable cases of erring logic amongst parliaments, governments, factions, etc. Errors that have actually occurred, and have recorded themselves as operative errors in historical results, cannot be disputed; whereas the errors that are imagined for the sake of illustration always present themselves as extravagances that express no real dangers incident to human thinking. It must occur, also, to anybody reflecting on this subject, that a vast proportion of bad logic rests upon false and defective definition. That two ideas can be associated or dissociated by the mediation of a third, depends upon the limits assigned to these ideas by definition, and that again depends upon a greatly improved valuation of words. Or, if we look to another resource of logic, viz division and subdivision, how faulty is that in cases innumerable; and that inference seems good, whilst such an idea is divided on a principle of bisection, which would not have seemed good had the division proceeded by trisection. Many collateral aids are needed for a new logic that should aim at real service. But these are now concurrently accumulating; and, even where they are not, Sir William Hamilton is that man who might be relied on for furnishing these aids from his own resources.

Whether he has any purpose of gratifying us all in that way I do not know; and there is an impertinence in suggesting any choice of labours to a man of profound views who must be supposed long ago to have been self-determined in this or that direction ; and nothing is less truly complimentary, though it may clothe itself in those forms of speech, than to imagine a profound and lifelong speculator as having any freedom left him for listening to random voices of suggestion. Yet, if it should happen that Sir William were to give us a comprehensive Logic, he will in that service be making a special atonement for a special offence of Scotland against Logic. It is interesting to notice some of the fierce contradictions that have domineered over the national mind in Scotland, both in matters of religion and of literature. For instance, the nation that (1) beyond all others has put forth a rancorous intolerance of Popery and especially of Popery intruding into the civil rights of men, (2) that most angrily protests against all hallowing of times and places, and (3) against all ceremonial usages—suffers all three principles to be violated at once, and itself in one most important concern of life to be laid under a yoke of slavery, such as rarely any Papal interdict has attempted to impose upon the most Popish of nations. During the month of May, in Scotland, there is neither marrying nor giving in marriage. Scotland spurns a Papal, and she allows of a Pagan, interdict. For one month out of twelve, a solemn suspension of Christianity silently takes place as regards one capital concern of life, and the nation to that extent re-enters upon its ancient allegiance to the heathen pantheon.<sup>1</sup> Hardly less remarkable is the self-contradiction of Scotland in its relation to Logic. We all know that everywhere throughout Christendom since the time of Lord Bacon, and very much in consequence of Lord Bacon, under the misinterpretation given to his words,<sup>2</sup> the fanciful idea has arisen of an essential opposition between the Aristotelian logic and the procedure by induction—not an opposition as to the separate conditions under which these methods could be usefully applied, but as to the comparative soundness of the methods themselves. A hundred years later than Lord Bacon, when Locke's influence began to diffuse itself, this prejudice became everywhere more obstinate. But, as to this point, Scotland outran all nations in the strength of her obstinacy. For the last hundred years, it is notorious that no expressions of hostility in relation to Aristotle so keen or so contemptuous have been avowed by the learned men of any nation as by those of Scotland. And these feelings, generally so unlimited in their verbal expression, have not usually been applied to any part of the Aristotelian physics, or psychology,—which are not much known in any country,—but almost exclusively (and, at any rate, pre-eminently) to the Organon. Now, it is a striking fact, when ranged over against this notorious tendency amongst the Scottish thinkers, what Sir William circumstantially illustrates to us—viz. that in older times the Scotch ranked in the estimation of the most cultivated nations, especially in the universities of France, Italy, and Spain, as the most zealous and the ablest expounders of Aristotle, consequently as his most effective champions. Then, as now, they did not rank high as masters of language,—generally of what was meant by humanity (the “literæ humaniores”), but as commentators and champions of Aristotle in his Logic they were preferred to men of all other nations. That is sharp enough in the way of contra-position; but sharper is this which follows,—and I cannot imagine by what tortuosity of evasion a Scotch hater of Aristotle could slip his neck out of such a noose.—

<sup>1</sup> The superstition against marriages in May still exists in Scotland, and far fewer marriages are intimated in that month in the Scottish newspapers than in any other. Still some do occur in May.—M

<sup>2</sup> But not always, I fear, under a misinterpretation. I cannot at this moment refer to them, but my impression is that there are passages in Lord Bacon which authorise this fanciful idea.

The Scottish Law is notoriously an adoption from the Civil Law; and,—for some reason, which I own myself unable to state,—in the jurisprudence which thus inoculates itself upon the Roman jurisprudence a larger use of the judicial process is conducted by written pleadings than in the English Law, which rejects the Roman. Thirty years ago I believe that this difference prevailed even more largely in Scotland; and, as all their pleadings were printed, one natural consequence of this arrangement was that enormous masses of such papers, when once their honey had been sufficiently sucked out by my lords the judges, were served up as cold dishes to a second table, open to the public at large. They were sold as rubbish or old almanacs. Flights of them came abroad as wrappings for parcels. And in that way the public, in which mob I formed one, without needing to pick locks, or to bribe servants, wormed ourselves into the knowledge of many family secrets. We "intromitted," as Scotch Law phrases it, with many family affairs, having no more business with them than I have at this moment to "intromit" with the King of Dahomey's harem. Now, the thing which fixed my attention, and caused me to muse exceedingly, was that nowhere before in all my reading, early or late, regular or contraband, had there faced me so many cases of direct, formal, undisguised syllogism as occurred in these earnest pleadings. Misunderstand me not, reader, as meaning that some superannuated and pedantic forms of reasoning, elsewhere obsolete, had here obtained a privileged and traditional footing. Not at all. They were the mere voice and utterance of natural earnestness, extorted, perhaps, at times from men who might disapprove of them æsthetically, but to whom, nevertheless, the just consideration that the salus clientis lex suprema recommended them as the best form of argument. Virtually, the syllogistic elements must have been used and covertly dispersed through the argument upon any mode of pleading. This could not have been evaded. But the rigorous form of the syllogism, ostentatiously parading itself, might have been evaded. That it was not, argued the overpowering sense of its use. The same harsh and naked obtrusion of the scholastic syllogism I had noticed in Hackstone of Rathillet,<sup>1</sup> when dealing with a religious proposition, in an agony of earnestness. And thus I said to myself, Here is a succession of learned men, with a zealotry unknown to the rest of the world, violently rejecting and disowning the whole clockwork of syllogism as if it were some monstrous impediment in the way of using our natural energies with freedom, and yet this same succession of men, when pleading for the dearest rights of property, or for the most sacred interests of truth—that is, in situations which throw back our human nature upon the instincts of its native sincerity, and when the clamorous necessity is for that resource which is most effectual to save—these very men we find coerced and driven beyond all others in Europe into the scholastic forms of argument, although beyond all others in Europe they had a motive in their previous undervaluation of such forms for strenuously rejecting them! No contradiction can be so broad as that between the Scotch inordinate disparagement of the syllogism in theory and the Scotch inordinate intrusion of it in their practice.

<sup>1</sup> David Hackstone of Rathillet, Scottish Covenanter, taken prisoner at the fight of Airmoss in July 1680, and hanged at Edinburgh on the 30th of that month for having carried arms against the King at Drumclog and Bothwell Bridge, and for his concern in the assassination of Archbishop Sharp in May 1679.—M.

One may descry, indeed, a double necessity as now working towards the same end,—that is, hurrying forward Logic to a great epoch in its evolution. There is the crying necessity, already noticed, that besieges the human mind on every line of advance, for a regulating discipline of exercise, that, whilst evoking the human energies, will not suffer them to be wasted. And, again, another necessity is arising out of such schisms as I have just cited from Scotland. The mere scandal of such contradictions and antinomies must arrest the attention in a degree that will terminate in a revolution. Even a case so broad of simple contradiction, contradiction amongst different individuals, would finally have that effect. But here it is evident that the contradictions were self-contradictions. for the people who, in obedience to a prevailing disparagement of scholasticism, disowned the syllogism as any legitimate form of argument, were precisely the same people that resorted to it in their practical extremities. And a scandal like that, I do say, is unparalleled in human science. And it is a scandal which, though not everywhere taking the amusing shape of using as your main weapon what you denounce as no weapon at all, nevertheless everywhere exists. Logica Docens is everywhere treated contemptuously, whilst Logica Utens is but another name for strength of reasoning, which is everywhere an object of intense ambition. That is, translating out of scholastic into ordinary language, logic as a thing to be taught and studied, logic as it is gathered into a book, is to this hour spoken of as bearing a very dubious value. whilst logic as a thing to be practised is so far from being disparaged that it is recognised universally as the whole difference between good reasoning and bad reasoning. And the very reason why the logic that is taught, and upon sale, and gathered into a book, is spoken of with so much suspicion or contempt, is, not because the natural gift of logic is held cheap, but for the very opposite reason—viz. because this gift is suspected to be so transcendently beyond the reach and grasp of human systems. There is here something which reminds us of the air we breathe. Two generations back, when the popular mind had not the least tincture of science, air was viewed as absolutely nothing, in fact, as the most complete cipher that exists in nature. Yet, even then, though, as a force, or power, or chemical agent, it had no place at all for our imagination generally, it was, however, known fearfully and allowed for in the dreadful effects of its absence. In like manner, logic is so much of a subjective thing, confounded with our general feeling of what constitutes ourselves, that originally we do not project it from the dead level in which it lies sunk. It is not made prominent if not forced into relief. The man who breathes most healthily is least conscious of his own breathing. And, as it is possible enough to be a most subtle logician without any direct or vivid consciousness of this admirable endowment, it ought not to surprise us that what may by possibility have escaped the knowledge of its possessor should exist as a subject of scepticism to the mere observer, and still more so that it should exist as a subject of a doubtful and variable appreciation. The confession of Southey, always natural in his judgments, and always faithful in reporting them, expresses accurately the general feeling upon this subject. Having himself received no logical training whatever, and sensible that his power of thinking had not therefore suffered, he might have been tempted into a scornful rejection of it as of a superfluous labour. But his candour, and his equitable disposition to acquiesce in other opinions adverse to his own, cause him to suspend. He wishes, and we must all wish, for a just adjudication upon this point. It would form the best introduction to a good logic; as, again, in its full compass, such an adjudication could only arise as a sequel and a sort of epilogue to such a logic.

Whether Sir W. H. will ever raise an edifice of so much labour and fatigue is (I suppose) quite uncertain to his closest friends. But so much is evident,—that, whenever, and by whomsoever, such an edifice shall be raised, the amplitude and the beauty of the superstructure will depend largely upon foundations already laid, and ground-plans already traced out, by the admirable labours of Sir William Hamilton.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Sir William Hamilton died May 6, 1856, ætat. 68, after having been Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in the University of Edinburgh for twenty years. At the date of the present sketch of him by De Quincey (1852), his philosophical fame, so far as published writings were concerned, rested chiefly on articles contributed from 1828 onwards to the Edinburgh Review (republished in French translation in Paris in 1840, and more completely by himself in 1852 in a volume entitled Discussions on Philosophy and Literature, Education and University Reform), and on an edition of Reid's Works, with Notes and Dissertations (1846). His Class-Lectures on Metaphysics and Logic were posthumously published in four volumes in 1859, under the editorship of Professor Mansel of Oxford and Professor Veitch of the University of Glasgow, and have gone through several editions. An edition of the Works of Dugald Stewart, on which he was engaged at the time of his death, was completed in 1858 by Professor Veitch; who is also the author of the most perfect biography of him (published in 1869) and of some independent expositions of his philosophical views.—M.

APPENDED NOTE to Page 332.

THIS passage from Leibnitz is cited by Mrs C [Mrs. Sara Coleridge] rightly in reproof of a precipitance committed many years ago by myself, who had ascribed the detection of the fallacy to her illustrious father. In apology for my error, I must mention that somewhere or other S. T. C. has (according to my impression) given the solution as his own, either from haste, or from forgetfulness, or because it really was his own—though unconsciously to himself he may have been anticipated by others. In so vast a field as literature now presents many and daily are the inevitable coincidences of profound thinkers when hunting in the same fields,—coincidences that will seem to argue plagiarism on one side or the other, and which yet were not plagiarisms. Even in this case I find a verification of that remark. For, in a memorandum of my own, dated some years earlier than my erroneous ascription of this idea to S. T. C., I find a reference made to Varignon, and also to some other French mathematician, flourishing about the year 1680-90 (and, therefore, contemporary with Leibnitz), as the authors of a solution virtually the same. Leibnitz, be it observed, does not formally claim the solution as his own. In a hasty letter, as in conversation, a man uses for a momentary and transient purpose many a borrowed idea, without meaning to appropriate it, and yet feeling no call upon himself to disclaim as his own what he had no thought of borrowing, not at all for its brilliancy or its felicity, but simply for its pertinence and instant application to some instant question. In his Theodicée, for instance, Leibnitz uses in this way many scores of alien doctrines or ideas without saying (or in honour needing to say) that these were other men's contributions to philosophy. It would not, therefore, tax him with plagiarism, if he had even consciously borrowed this explanation from Varignon. For it was the idea, and not the ownership of the idea, that occupied his mind at the moment of pressing it upon his correspondent's attention. The hurry of Leibnitz, I would also remark, is sufficiently evident from the gross inaccuracy of his expression, "à savoir aller aussi vite qu'Achille," for the Greek dialecticians were far from making the tortoise go as fast as Achilles. On the contrary, it was upon the very counterpostulate, —viz. the assumption that the speed of the tortoise was ten times less than the speed of Achilles,—that they founded the irritation of the case. Precisely upon this consideration, that Achilles was by so many degrees the fleetest, rested the whole pungency of the paradox, that nevertheless, and with all his superiority, the divine man was destined metaphysically not to come up with the tortoise. Justly, indeed, it has been noticed of Leibnitz, that, although by native constitution of mind inclined to scholastic rigour of thinking, he was yet betrayed oftentimes by the laxity of epistolary discussion into careless modes of expressing truths, and into a dangerous negligence as to the limitations of those truths. Much of Leibnitz's mind revealed itself in letters, and letters are a dangerous form of composition. Not the haste only, not the genial carelessness only, but also the courtesy and amenity of letter-writing, and, in L.'s particular case, his wish to combine the tone of social and Parisian urbanity with the gravity of a philosopher, tempted him into dangerous accommodations of opinion to the temper or prejudices of his particular correspondent. Accordingly, in the case now before us, a gross oversight has escaped Leibnitz, and one which he would himself have acknowledged for such, if summoned to review it—viz. this,—that, in a subsequent letter to this same M. Foucher, alleged also by Mrs Coleridge, he says, "that P. Gregoire de St. Vincent has shown, by means of geometry, the exact place where Achilles must have caught the tortoise": pp. 115-118 l. in Erdmann's edition of his collective works. This, pace tanti viri, is pure impertinence. Of course, as the ratio of motion for Achilles and the tortoise is given, together with the length of the course and the amount of grace (or "law") conceded to the tortoise, all these things being among the data, it becomes easy, upon assuming a certain number of feet for the stride of Achilles, to mark the precise point at which that "impiger" young gentleman will fly past his antagonist like a pistol-shot, and, being also "iracundus, inexorabilis, acer," will endeavour to leave his blessing with the tortoise in the shape of a kick (though, according to the picturesque remark of Sydney Smith, it is as vain to caress a tortoise, or, on the other hand, to kick him, as it is to pat and fondle, or to tickle, the dome of St Paul's). Very little geometry would have sufficed Mr. St Vincent for reaching such a result. But this is all beside the purpose. We know without geometry that, as the subdivisions of space narrow and narrow between the two competitors, at length they will dwindle to a point so exquisitely small that one stride of Achilles will carry him past like a gale of wind, and for ever invert the local relations of the parties. Indeed, it is evident at a glance that, upon the principle assumed of ten velocities in Achilles to one velocity in the tortoise, already by the time that the tortoise can have finished the second tenth of the course, Achilles will have finished the ten-tenths,—that is, the entire course,—and will have nothing left to do, when the tortoise still has an arrear of eight-tenths to perform. But all this only sharpens the sting of the problem. That there should exist for the reason what to a certainty would not exist for the actual experience, exactly this it is which constitutes the difficulty. Where and when this result will take place, at what particular point of the course, answers no question and meets no difficulty that could rationally occur to any man in his waking senses. So far from solving any difficulty, as Leibnitz supposes, St. Vincent's geometrical investigation, on the contrary, would have repeated and published the difficulty in a broader shape. It is precisely because Achilles will in practice go ahead of the tortoise, when, conformably to a known speculative argument, he ought not to go ahead—it is precisely this fact, so surely to be anticipated from all our experience, when confronted with this principle so peremptorily denying the possibility of such a fact—exactly this antinomy it is,—the will be, as a physical reality, ranged against the cannot be, as apparently a metaphysical law—this downright certainty as matched against this downright impossibility,—which, in default of the Leibnitzian solution, constitutes our perplexity, or, to use a Grecian word still more expressive, which constitutes our aporia, that is, our resourcelessness. Abiding by the one infinity, as the Greek sophists did, we are strictly without resource. On the other hand, arming against that infinity the counter-infinity, as suggested by Leibnitz, then we find the reason is reconciled with itself. But the resource suggested by St. Vincent is simply the re-affirmation of the aporia. Achilles will pass. My friend, we know he will; we are sure of it, and precisely in that certainty lies the perplexity of the case.

Let me illustrate this by another case of the same kind. In ancient Greece there emerged suddenly to a musing philosopher what seemed a strong a priori argument against motion; that is, against the possibility of motion. Upon this another philosopher, viz the Eleatic Zeno, without attempting to meet and to dissolve the argument, rose up from his seat, and walked,—reclarguebat ambulando, according to his conceit, he refuted the sophist by moving his spindles shanks, saying, “Thus I refute the argument. I move, as a fact, and, if motion is a fact of the experience, then motion, as an idea, is conformable to the reason.” But to me it is plain that Zeno as little comprehended the true incidence and pressure of the difficulty as G. de St. V. understood the perplexity involved in our tortoise-shell friend's Olympic contest with Achilles. The case was briefly this:—Reason, as then interpreted, said, This thing cannot be. Nature said, But, though impossible, it is a fact. Metaphysics denied it as conceivable. Experience affirmed it as actual. There was, therefore, war in the human mind, and the scandal of an unreconcilable schism. Two oracles within the human mind fought against each other. But, in such circumstances, to reaffirm or to exalt either oracle is simply to reinforce and strengthen the feud. Were some reason alleged in the very opposite direction, viz. for discrediting one of the antagonist forces, that would at least tend towards the suppression of the feud; according to the strength of the reason, it would move at least upon the right line for accomplishing such an end. The conflict depends upon the parity of the conflicting forces; and whatever therefore disables the authority on either side, or throws doubt upon it, must, by increasing the disparity of the forces, and unsettling their equilibrium, have a tendency pro tanto to terminate the feud. But the man who (like Zeno) simply parades the strength and plausibility investing one of the forces, without attempting in the smallest degree to invalidate the other, does, in fact, only publish and repeat the very ground of your perplexity. That argument, strong as the centrifugal force, which so tauntingly and so partially he causes to coruscate before your eyes, you know but too well. Knowing that, however, does not enable you to hide from yourself the antagonist argument, or to deny that in power it corresponds to a centripetal force. How needless to show you that motion exists as a fact! Too sensible you are of that; for what else is it than this fact which arms with the power of perplexing and confounding the metaphysical scruples affecting the idea of motion? But for the too great certainty of this fact, where would be the antinomy? In a doctrine which denies, and plausibly denies, the phenomenon X, what could there be to startle or to shock, unless through some other channel you had learned continually that nevertheless X does exist? The antinomy it is—the frightful co-existence of the to be and the not to be—this it is that agitates and distresses you. But how is that antinomy,—a secret word of two horns, which we may represent for the moment under the figure of two syllables,—lessened or reconciled by repeating one of these syllables, as did Zeno, leaving the secret consciousness to repeat the other?

CHARLEMAGNE<sup>1</sup>

HISTORY is sometimes treated under the splendid conception of "philosophy teaching by example," and sometimes as an "old almanac"; and, agreeably to this latter estimate, we ourselves once heard a celebrated living professor of surgery,<sup>2</sup> who has been since distinguished by royal favour, and honoured with a title, making it his boast that he had never charged his memory with one single historical fact; that on the contrary he had, out of profound contempt for a sort of knowledge so utterly without value in his eyes, anxiously sought to extirpate from his remembrance, or, if that were impossible, to perplex and confound, any relics of historical records which might happen to survive from his youthful studies. "And I am happy to say," added he, "and it is consoling to have it in my power conscientiously to declare; that, although I have not been able to dismiss entirely from my mind some ridiculous fact about a succession of four great monarchies, since human infirmity still clings to our best efforts, and will for ever prevent our attaining perfection, still I have happily succeeded in so far confounding all distinctions of things and persons, of time and of places, that I could not assign the era of any one transaction, as I

<sup>1</sup> Published in Blackwood for November 1832, under the title "James's History of Charlemagne," as a review of "The History of Charlemagne, with a Sketch of the History of France from the Fall of the Roman Empire to the Rise of the Carolingian Dynasty. By G. P. R. James, Esq, London, 1832." Reprinted by De Quincey in 1859 in the thirteenth volume of his Collected Writings.—M.

<sup>2</sup> "A celebrated living professor":—Living when this was written [i.e. in 1832].

humbly trust, within a thousand years. The whole vast series of History is become a wilderness to me; and my mind, as to all such absurd knowledge, under the blessing of Heaven, is pretty nearly a tabula rasa." I was present at this étalage of ignorance, as perhaps I may already have informed the reader. And the case reminded me of one popularly ascribed to Orator Henley, who, in disputing with some careless fellow in a coffee-house, suddenly arrested his noisy antagonist by telling him that in one short sentence he had perpetrated two enormous mythologic blunders, having interchangeably confounded Plutus, the blind god of wealth, with Pluto, the gloomy tyrant of the infernal realms. "Confounded them, have I?" said the mythologic criminal. "Well, so much the better; confound them both for two old rogues." "But," said Henley, "you have done them both unspeakable wrong." "With all my heart," rejoined the other; "they are heartily welcome to everything unspeakable below the moon: thank God, I know very little of such ruffians." "But how?" said Henley, "do I understand you to mean that you thank God for your ignorance?" "Well, suppose I do," said the respondent, "what have you to do with that?" "Oh, nothing," cried Henley; "only I should say that in that case you had a great deal to be thankful for." I was young at that time, little more than a boy, and thirstily I sighed to repeat this little story as applicable to the present case. In fact it was too applicable; and, in case Sir Anthony<sup>1</sup> should be of the same opinion, I remembered seasonably that the finished and accomplished surgeon carries a pocket case of surgical implements,—lancets, for instance, that are loaded with virus in every stage of contagion. Might he not inoculate me with rabies, with hydrophobia, with the plague of Cairo? On the whole, it seemed better to make play against Sir Anthony with a sudden coruscation of forked logic, which accordingly I did, insisting upon it that, as the true point of ambition was now changed for the philosophic student (the maximum of ignorance being the goal aimed at, and no longer the maximum of light), it had become outrageously vain-glorious in Sir Anthony to rehearse the steps of his own darkness; that we, the chance-people in Mrs Montagu's drawing-room, were young beginners, novices that had no advantages to give us a chance in such a contest with central darkness in the persons of veteran masters. Mrs. Montagu took my side, and said that I, for instance, myself did very well, considering how short had been my career as regarded practice; but it was really unfair to look for perfection in a mere beginner. In this Gothic expression of self-congratulation upon the extent of his own ignorance, though doubtless founded upon what the Germans call an einseitig<sup>1</sup> or one-sided estimate, there was, however, that sort of truth which is apprehended only by strong minds,—such minds as naturally adhere to extreme courses. Certainly the blank knowledge of facts, which is all that most readers gather from their historial studies, is a mere deposition of rubbish without cohesion, and resting upon no basis of theory (that is, of general comprehensive survey) applied to the political development of nations, and accounting for the great stages of their internal movements.

<sup>1</sup> Can Sir Astley Cooper (1768-1841) have been the celebrated surgeon meant, and can De Quincey have written "Sir Anthony" here by mistake, in momentary recollection of the two Anthony Ashley Coopers who were Earls of Shaftesbury?—M

Rightly and profitably to understand History, it ought to be studied in as many ways as it may be written. History, as a composition, falls into three separate arrangements, obeying three distinct laws, and addressing itself to three distinct objects. Its first and humblest office is to deliver a naked unadorned exposition of public events and their circumstances. This form of History may be styled the purely Narrative; the second form is that which may be styled the Scemical, and the third the Philosophic. What is meant by Philosophic History is well understood in our present advanced state of society, and few histories are written, except in the simplest condition of human culture, which do not in part assume its functions, or which are content to rest their entire attraction upon the abstract interest of facts. The privileges of this form have, however, been greatly abused; and the truth of facts has been so much forced to bend before preconceived theories, whereas every valid theory ought to be abstracted from the facts, that Mr. Southey and others in this day have set themselves to decry the whole genus and class, as essentially at war with the very primary purposes of the art. But, under whatever name, it is evident that philosophy, or an investigation of the true moving forces in every great train and sequence of national events, and an exhibition of the motives and the moral consequences in their largest extent which have concurred with these events, cannot be omitted in any history above the level of a childish understanding. Mr. Southey himself will be found to illustrate this necessity by his practice, whilst assailing it in principle. As to the other mode of History,—History treated scenically,—it is upon the whole the most delightful to the reader, and the most susceptible of art and ornament in the hands of a skilful composer. The most celebrated specimen in the vulgar opinion is the Decline and Fall of Gibbon. And to this class may in part be referred the Historical Sketches of Voltaire.<sup>1</sup> Histories of this class proceed upon principles of selection, presupposing in the reader a general knowledge of the great cardinal incidents, and bringing forward into especial notice those only which are susceptible of being treated with distinguished effect.

<sup>1</sup> Mark, reader, the progress of language, and consequently of novel ideas. This was written nearly thirty years ago, and at that time the term needed an apologetic formula.

These are the three separate modes of treating history. each has its distinct purposes; and all must contribute to make up a comprehensive total of historical knowledge. The first furnishes the facts; the second opens a thousand opportunities for pictures of manners and national temper in every stage of their growth; whilst the third abstracts the political or the ethical moral, and unfolds the philosophy which knits the history of one nation to that of others, and exhibits the whole under their internal connexion, as parts of one great process, carrying on the great economy of human improvement by many stages in many regions at one and the same time

<sup>1</sup> In part we say, because in part also the characteristic differences of these works depend upon the particular mode of the narrative. For narration itself, as applied to History, admits of a triple arrangement,—dogmatic, sceptical, and critical. dogmatic, which adopts the current records without examination, sceptical, as Horace Walpole's Richard III, Malcolm Lang's Dissertation on Perkin Warbeck, or on the Gowrie Conspiracy, which expressly undertakes to probe and try the unsound parts of the story, and critical, which, after an examination of this nature, selects from the whole body of materials such as are coherent. There is besides another ground of difference in the quality of historical narratives. viz between those which move by means of great public events, and those which (like the Cæsars of Suetonius and the French Memoirs), postulating all such capital events as are necessarily already known, and keeping them in the background, crowd their foreground with those personal and domestic notices which we call anecdotes.

Pursued upon this comprehensive scale, the study of History is the study of human nature. But some have continued to reject it, not upon any objection to the quality of the knowledge gained, but simply on the ground of its limited extent: contending that in public and political transactions, such as compose the matter of History, human nature exhibits itself upon too narrow a scale and under too monotonous an aspect; that under different names, and in connexion with different dates and regions, events virtually the same are continually revolving; that whatever novelty may strike the ear, in passages of history taken from periods widely remote, affects the names only, and circumstances that are extra-essential, that the passions meantime, the motives, and (allowing for difference of manners) the means even, are subject to no variety, that in ancient or in modern history there is no real accession made to our knowledge of human nature; but that all proceeds by cycles of endless repetition, and in fact that, according to the old complaint, "there is nothing new under the sun."

It is not true that "there is nothing new under the sun." This is the complaint, as all men know, of a jaded voluptuary, seeking for a new pleasure and finding none, for reasons which lay in his own vitiated nature. Why did he seek for novelty? Because old pleasures had ceased to stimulate his exhausted organs; and that was reason enough why no new pleasure, had any been found, would operate as such for him. The weariness of spirit and the poverty of pleasure, which he bemoaned as belonging to our human condition, were not in reality objective (as a German philosopher would express himself), or laid in the nature of things, and thus pressing upon all alike, but subjective,—that is to say, derived from the peculiar state and affections of his own organs for apprehending pleasure. Not the τὸ apprehensibile, but the τὸ apprehendens, was in fault; not the pleasures, or the dewy freshness of pleasures, had decayed, but the sensibilities of him who thus undertook to appraise them were blasés and exhausted.

More truly and more philosophically, it may be said that there is nothing old under the sun, no absolute repetition. It is the well-known doctrine of Leibnitz, that amongst the familiar objects of our daily experience there is no perfect identity.<sup>1</sup> All in external nature proceeds by endless variety. Infinite change, illimitable novelty, inexhaustible difference, these are the foundations upon which nature builds and ratifies her purpose of individuality,—so indispensable, amongst a thousand other great uses, to the very elements of social distinctions and social rights. But for the endless circumstances of difference which characterize external objects, the rights of property, for instance, would have stood upon no certain basis, nor admitted of any general or comprehensive guarantee.

As with external objects, so with human actions: amidst their infinite approximations and affinities, they are separated

<sup>1</sup> Leibnitz (who was twice in England), when walking in Kensington Gardens with the Princess of Wales,—whose admiration oscillated between this great countryman of her own and Sir Isaac Newton, the corresponding idol of her adopted country,—took occasion, from the beautiful scene about them, to explain in a lively way, and at the same time to illustrate and verify, this favourite thesis: Turning to a gentleman in attendance upon her Royal Highness, he challenged him to produce two leaves from any tree or shrub which should be exact duplicates or facsimiles of each other in those lines which variegated the surface. The challenge was accepted; but the result justified Leibnitz. It is in fact upon this infinite variety in the superficial lines of the human palm that palmistry is grounded (or the science of divination by the hieroglyphics written on each man's hand), and has its prima facie justification. Were it otherwise, this mode of divination would not have even a plausible sanction; for, without the inexhaustible varieties which are actually found in the combination of these lines, and which give to each separate individual his own separate type, the same identical fortunes must be often repeated, and there would be no foundation for assigning to each his peculiar and characteristic destiny.

by circumstances of never-ending diversity. History may furnish her striking correspondences, Biography her splendid parallels, Rome may in certain cases appear but the mirror of Athens, England of Rome; and yet, after all, no character can be cited, no great transaction, no revolution of "high-vised cities," no catastrophe of nations, which, in the midst of its resemblances to distant correspondences in other ages, does not include features of abundant distinction, and individualizing characteristics so many and so important as to yield its own peculiar matter for philosophical meditation and its own separate moral. Rare is the case in history, or (to speak with suitable boldness) there is none, which does not involve circumstances capable, to a learned eye, without any external aid from chronology, of referring it to its own age. The doctrine of Leibnitz, on the grounds of individuality in the objects of sense, may, in fact, be profitably extended to all the great political actions of mankind. Many pass, in a popular sense, for pure transcripts or duplicates of similar cases in past times; but, accurately speaking, none are such truly and substantially. Neither are the differences by which they are severally marked and featured interesting only to the curiosity or to the spirit of minute research. All public acts, in the degree in which they are great and comprehensive, are steeped in living feelings and saturated with the spirit of their own age, and the features of their individuality, — that is, the circumstances which chiefly distinguish them from their nearest parallels in other times, and chiefly prevent them from lapsing into blank repetitions of the same identical case, — are generally the very cardinal points, the organs, and the depositories which lodge whatever best expresses the temper and tendencies of the age to which they belong. So far are these special points of distinction from being slight or trivial that in them par excellence is gathered and concentrated whatever a political philosopher would be best pleased to insulate and to converge within his field of view.

This indeed is evident upon consideration, and is in some sense implied in the very verbal enunciation of the proposition: in terminis, it should strike every man who reflects, that in great national transactions of different ages, so far resembling each other as to merit the description of parallels, all the circumstances of agreement, all those which compose the resemblance, for the very reason that they are common to both periods of time, specially and characteristically belong to neither. It is the differential, and not the common,—the points of special dissimilitude, not those of general similitude,—which manifestly must be looked to for the philosophic valuation of the times or the people, for the adjudication of their peculiar claims in a comparison with other times and other peoples, and for the appraisement of the progress made, whether positively for its total amount, or, relatively to itself, for its rate of advance at each separate stage.

It is in this way of critical examination that comparison and the collation of apparent parallels, from being a pure amusement of ingenuity, rises to a philosophic labour, and that the study of History becomes at once dignified, and in a most practical sense profitable. It is the opinion of the subtlest and the most combining (if not the most useful) philosopher whom England has produced,<sup>1</sup> that a true knowledge of history confers the gift of prophecy; or that intelligently and sagaciously to have looked backwards is potentially to have looked forwards. For example, he is of opinion that any student of the great English Civil War in the reign of Charles I who should duly have noted the signs precurrent and concurrent of those days, and should also have read the contemporary political pamphlets, coming thus prepared, could not have failed, after a corresponding study of the French Literature from 1750 to 1788, and, in particular, after collecting the general sense and temper of the French people from the Cahiers (or codes of instruction transmitted by the electoral bodies to the members of the first National Assembly), to foresee in clear succession the long career of revolutionary frenzy which soon afterwards deluged Europe with tears and blood. This may perhaps be conceded, and without prejudice to the doctrine just now delivered, of endless diversity in political events. For it is certain that the political movements of nations obey everlasting laws, and travel through the stages of known cycles, which thus insure enough of resemblance to guarantee the general outline of a sagacious prophecy ; whilst, on the other hand, the times, the people, and the extraordinary minds which, in such critical eras, soon reveal themselves at the head of affairs, never fail of producing their appropriate and characteristic results of difference. Sameness enough there will always be to encourage the true political seer, with difference enough to confer upon each revolution its own separate character and its peculiar interest

<sup>1</sup> Coleridge?—M.

All this is strikingly illustrated in the history of those great revolutionary events which belong to the life and times of the Emperor Charlemagne. If any one period in History might be supposed to offer a barren and unprofitable picture of war, rapine, and bloodshed, unfeared by characteristic differences, and unimproved by any peculiar moral, it is this section of the European annals. Removed from our present times by a thousand years, divided from us by the profound gulf of what we usually denominate the dark ages, placed, in fact, entirely upon the farther side of that great barrier,<sup>1</sup> this period of History can hardly be expected to receive much light from contemporary documents in an age so generally illiterate,—not from national archives, or state papers, when diplomacy was so rare, when so large a proportion of its simple transactions was conducted by personal intercourse, and after the destruction wrought amongst its slender chancery of written memorials by the revolution of one entire millennium. Still less could we have reason to hope for much light from private memoirs at a period when the means of writing were as slenderly diffused as the motives, when the rare endowments, natural and acquired, for composing History could so seldom happen to coincide with the opportunities for obtaining accurate information ; when the writers were so few, and the audience so limited, to which any writers soever could then profitably address themselves. With or without illustration, however, the age itself, and its rapid succession of wars between barbarous and semi-barbarous tribes, might, if any one chapter in History, be presumed barren of either interest or instruction, wearsomely monotonous, and, by comparison with any parallel section from the records of other nations in the earliest stages of dawning civilisation, offering no one feature of novelty beyond the names of the combatants, their local and chronological relations, and the peculiar accidents and unimportant circumstances of variety in the conduct or issue of the several battles which they fought.

<sup>1</sup> According to the general estimate of Philosophical History, the tenth century (or perhaps the tenth and the eleventh conjointly) must be regarded as the true meridian, or the perfect midnight, of the Dark Ages.

Yet, in contradiction to all these very plausible presumptions, even this remote period teems with its own peculiar and separate instruction. It is the first great station, so to speak, which we reach after entering the portals of Modern History.<sup>1</sup> It presents us with the evolution and propagation of Christianity in its present central abodes; with the great march of civilisation, and the gathering within the pale of that mighty agency for elevating human nature, and beneath the gentle yoke of the only true and beneficent religion, of the last rebellious recusants among the European family of nations. We meet also, in conjunction with the other steps of the vast humanizing process then going on, the earliest efforts at legislation, recording, at the same time, the barbarous condition of those for whom they were designed, and the anti-barbarous views, alien or exotic, of the legislator, in the midst of his condescensions to the infirmities of his subjects. Here also we meet with the elementary state, growing and as yet imperfectly rooted, of feudalism. Here, too, we behold in their incunabula, forming and arranging themselves under the pressure of circumstances, the existing kingdoms of Christendom. So far, then, from being a mere echo, or repetition, of analogous passages in history, the period of Charlemagne is novel to the extent of ambitious originality in its instruction, and almost unique in the quality of that instruction. For here only perhaps we see the social system forming itself in the mine, and the very process, as it were, of crystallization going on beneath our eyes. Mr. James, therefore, may be regarded as not less fortunate in the choice of his subject than meritorious in its treatment; indeed, his work is not so much the best as the only History of Charlemagne which will hereafter be cited. For it reposes upon a far greater body of research and collation than has hitherto been applied even in France to this interesting theme<sup>1</sup>; and in effect it is the first account of the great emperor and his times which can, with a due valuation of the term, be complimented with the title of a critical memoir.

<sup>1</sup> It has repeatedly been made a question, at what era we ought to date the transition from Ancient to Modern History. This question merits a separate dissertation. Meantime it is sufficient to say in this place that Justinian in the sixth century will unanimously be referred to the ancient division, Charlemagne in the eighth to the modern. These, then, are two limits fixed in each direction, and somewhere between them must lie the frontier line. Now the era of Mahomet in the seventh century is evidently the exact and perfect line of demarcation. not only as pretty nearly bisecting the debateable ground, but also because the rise of the Mohammedan power, as operating so powerfully upon the Christian kingdoms of the south, and through them upon the whole of Christendom, at that time beginning to mould themselves and to knit, marks in the most eminent sense the birth of a new era.

Charlemagne, "the greatest man of the middle ages," in the judgment of his present biographer, was born A. D. 742, seven years before his father assumed the name of King. This date has been disputed; but, on the whole, we may take it as settled, upon various collateral computations, that the year now assigned is the true one. The place is less certain; but we do not think Mr. James warranted in saying that it is "unknown." If everything is to be pronounced "unknown" for which there is no absolute proof of a kind to satisfy forensic rules of evidence, or which has ever been made a question for debate, in that case we may apply a sponge to the greater part of History before the era of printing. Aix-la-Chapelle, Mr. James goes on to tell us, is implied as the birthplace in one of the chief authorities. But our own impression is that, according to the general belief of succeeding ages, it was not Aix-la-Chapelle, but Ingelheim, a village near Mentz, to which that honour belonged. Some have supposed that Carlsburg, in Bavaria, was the true place of his birth, and, indeed, that it drew its name from that distinguished event. Frantzius, in particular, says that in his day the castle of that place was still shown to travellers with the reverential interest attached to such a pretension. But, after all, he gives his own vote for Ingelheim; and it is singular that he does not so much as mention Aix-la-Chapelle.

<sup>1</sup> Or, in fact, than is likely to manifest itself to an unlearned reader of Mr. James's own book; for he has omitted to load his margin with references to authorities in many scores of instances where he might, and perhaps where he ought, to have accredited his narrative by those indications of research.

Of his education and his early years Mr. James is of opinion that we know as little as of his birthplace. Certainly our information upon these particulars is neither full nor circumstantial; yet we know as much, perhaps, in these respects, of Charlemagne as of Napoleon Bonaparte. And remarkable enough it is that, not relatively (or making allowances for the age), but absolutely, Charlemagne was much more accomplished than Napoleon in the ordinary business of a modern education,—Charlemagne in the middle of the eighth century than Napoleon in the latter end of the eighteenth. Charlemagne was, in fact, the most accomplished man of his age; Napoleon a sciolist for any age. The tutor of Charlemagne was Peter of Pisa, a man eminent at that time for his attainments in literature (in re grammaticâ). From him it was that Charlemagne learned Latin and Greek. Greek in such a degree “ut sufficienter intelligeret,” and Latin to the extent of using it familiarly and fluently in conversation. Now, as to the man of the eighteenth century, Greek was to him as much a sealed language as Chinese; and, even with regard to Latin, his own secretary doubts upon one occasion whether he was sufficiently master of it to translate Juvenal’s expressive words Panem et Circenses. Yet he had enjoyed the benefits of an education in a royal college, in a country which regards itself self-complacently as at the head of civilisation. Again, there is a pretty strong tradition (which could hardly arise but upon some foundation) that Charlemagne had cultivated the Arabic so far as to talk it,<sup>1</sup> having no motive to that attainment more urgent than that political considerations made it eligible for him to undertake an expedition against those who could negotiate in no other language. Now, let it be considered how very much more powerful arguments there were in Napoleon's position for mastering the German and the English. His continental policy moved entirely upon the pivot of central Europe,—that is, the German system of nations, the great federation of powers upon the Rhine and the Danube. And, as to England, his policy and his passions alike pointed in that direction as uniformly and as inevitably as the needle to the pole. Every morning, we are told, tossing aside the Paris journals as so many babbling echoes of his own public illusions, expressing rather what was desired than what was probable, he required of his secretary that he should read off into French the leading newspapers of England. And many were the times when he started up in fury, and passionately taxed his interpreter with mistranslation,—sometimes as softening the expressions, sometimes as over-colouring their violence. Evidently he lay at the mercy of one whom he knew to be wanting in honour, and who had it in his power, either by way of abetting any sinister views of his own, or in collusion with others, to suppress, to add, to garble, and in every possible way to colour and distort what he was interpreting. Yet neither could this humiliating sense of dependency on the one hand, nor the instant pressure of political interest on the other, ever urge Napoleon to the effort of learning English in the first case, German or Spanish in the second. Charlemagne, again, cultivated most strenuously and successfully, as an accomplishment peculiarly belonging to the functions of his high station, the art and practice of eloquence; and he had this reward of his exertions—that he was accounted the most eloquent man of his age. “totis viribus ad orationem exercendam conversus naturalem facundiam ita roboravit studio ut præter [l. propter] promptum ac profluens sermonis genus facile ævi sui eloquentissimus crederetur” Turn to Bonaparte. It was a saying of his sycophants, that he sometimes spoke like a god, and sometimes worse than the feeblest of mortals. But, says one who knew him well,—“the mortal I have often heard, unfortunately never yet the god.” He, who sent down this sneer

<sup>1</sup> “Arabice loquutum esse Angolando Saracenorum regulo Turpinus [the famous Archbishop] auctor est; nec id fide indignum. Dum enim in expeditione Hispanicâ præcipuam belli molem in illum vertit, facile temporis tractu notitiam linguæ sibi comparare potuit.”—FRANTZ Hist. Car. Mag. That is, he had time sufficient for this acquisition, and a motive sufficient.

to posterity was at Napoleon's right hand on the most memorable occasion of his whole career—that cardinal occasion, as we may aptly term it (for upon that his whole fortunes hinged), when he intruded violently upon the Legislative Body, dissolved the Directory, and effected the revolution of the eighteenth Brumaire. That revolution it was which raised him to the Consular power; and by that revolution, considered in its manner and style, we may judge of Napoleon in several of his chief pretensions—courage, presence of mind, dignity, and eloquence; for then, if ever, these qualities were all in instant requisition: one word effectually urged by the antagonist parties, a breath, a gesture, a nod, suitably followed up, would have made the total difference between ruler of France and a traitor hurried away à la lanterne. It is true that the miserable imbecility of all who should have led the hostile parties, the irresolution and the quiet-loving temper of Moreau, the base timidity of Bernadotte,—in fact, the total defect of heroic minds amongst the French of that day,—neutralized the defects and more than compensated the blunders of Napoleon. But these were advantages that could not be depended on: a glass of brandy extraordinary might have emboldened the greatest poltroon to do that which, by once rousing a movement of popular enthusiasm, once making a beginning in that direction, would have precipitated the whole affair into hands which must have carried it far beyond the power of any party to control. Never, according to all human calculation, were eloquence and presence of mind so requisite. never was either so deplorably wanting. A passionate exposition of the national degradations inflicted by the imbecility of the Directors, an appeal to the assembly as Frenchmen, contrasting the glories of 1796 with the Italian disasters that had followed, might, by connecting the new candidate for power with the public glory, and the existing rulers with all the dishonours which had settled on the French banners, have given an electric shock to the patriotism of the audience, such as would have been capable for the moment of absorbing their feelings as partisans. In a French assembly, movements of that nature, under a momentary impulse, are far from being uncommon. Here, then, if never before, here, if never again, the grandeur of the occasion demanded,—almost, we might say, implored, and clamorously invoked,—the effectual powers of eloquence and perfect self-possession.

How was the occasion met? Let us turn to the actual scene, as painted in lively colours by a friend and an eye-witness<sup>1</sup>.—“The accounts brought every instant to General Bonaparte determined him to enter the hall [of the Ancients] and take part in the debate. His entrance was hasty, and in anger; no favourable prognostics of what he would say. The passage by which we entered led directly forward into the middle of the house; our backs were towards the door, Bonaparte had the President on his right; he could not see him quite in front. I found myself on the General’s right; our clothes touched: Berthier was on his left. All the harangues composed for Bonaparte after the event differ from each other: no miracle that. There was, in fact, none pronounced to the Ancients; unless a broken conversation with the President, carried on without nobleness, propriety, or dignity, may be called a speech. We heard only these words—‘Brothers in arms—frankness of a soldier.’ The interrogatories of the President were clear. Nothing could be more confused or worse enounced than the au-

<sup>1</sup> Not having the French original of Bourrienne’s work, we are compelled to quote from the current translation, which, however, is everywhere incorrect, and in a degree absolutely astonishing, and, where not incorrect, offensive from vulgarisms or ludicrous expressions. Thus, it translates un drôle, a droll fellow, wide as the poles from the true meaning, ce drôle-là means that scoundrel. Again, the verb devoir, in all tenses (that eternal stumbling-block to bad French scholars), is uniformly mistranslated. As an instance of ignoble language, at p. 294, vol. 1, he says, “Josephine was delighted with the disposition of her goodman,” a word used only by undebred people. But, of all the absurdities which disfigure the work, what follows is perhaps the most striking.—“Kleber,” he says, “took a precognition of the army,” p. 231, vol. 1. A precognition! What Pagan ceremony may that be? Know, reader, that this monster of a word is a technical term of Scotch law, and even to the Scotch, excepting those few who know a little of law, absolutely unintelligible. In speaking thus harshly, we are far from meaning anything unkind to the individual translator; whom, on the contrary, for his honourable sentiments in relation to the merits of Bonaparte, we greatly respect. But that has nothing to do with French translation—the condition of which, in this country, is perfectly scandalous.

“biguous and disjointed replies of Bonaparte. He spoke “incoherently of volcanoes—secret agitations—victories—“constitution violated. He found fault even with the 18th “Fructidor, of which he had himself been the prime insti“gator and most powerful upholder” [Not, reader, observe, from bold time-serving neglect of his own principles, but from absolute distraction of mind, and incoherency of purpose.] “Then came Cæsar—Cromwell—Tyrant”—[allusions which, of all others, were the most unseasonable for that crisis, and for his position]. “He repeated several times—“I have no more than that to tell you, and he had told them “nothing. Then out came the words,—Liberty, Equality.
 “for these every one saw he had not come to St. Cloud
 “Then his action became animated, and we lost him—com“prehending nothing beyond 18th Fructidor, 30th Prairial, “hypocrites, intriguers, I am not so; I shall declare all; I “will abdicate the power when the danger which threatens the “Republic has passed” Then, after further instances of Napoleon’s falsehood, and the self-contradictory movements of his disjointed babble, the Secretary goes on thus: “These “interruptions, apostrophes, and interrogations, overwhelmed “him; he believed himself lost. The disapprobation be“came more violent, and his discourse still more wanting in “method and coherence. Sometimes he addressed the repre“sentatives quite stultified; sometimes the military in the “court [i.e. outside], who were beyond hearing; then, with“out any transition, he spoke of the thunder of war, say“ing, I am accompanied by the god of war and fortune. The “President then calmly observed to him that he found no“thing, absolutely nothing, upon which they could deli“berate; that all he had said was vague. Explain yourself, “unfold the plots into which you have been invited to enter “Bonaparte repeated the same things; and in what style!
 “No idea in truth can be formed of the whole scene, unless “by those present. There was not the least order in all he “stammered out (to speak sincerely) with the most incon“ceivable incoherence. Bonaparte was no orator. Per“ceiving the bad effect produced upon the meeting by this “rhapsody, and the progressive confusion of the speaker, I “whispered (pulling his coat gently at the same time)—

“ ‘Retire, General ; you no longer know what you are saying.’ I made a sign to Berthier to second me in persuading him to leave the place ; when suddenly, after stammering out a few words more, he turned round, saying, “ ‘Let all who love me follow.’ ” So ended this famous scene—in which, more than in any other upon record, eloquence and presence of mind were needful. And if it should be said that vagueness was not altogether the least eligible feature in a speech whose very purpose was to confuse, and to leave no room for answer, we reply—true ; but then it was the vagueness of art, which promised to be serviceable, and that of preconceived perplexity, not the vagueness of incoherence and a rhapsody of utter contradiction.<sup>1</sup>

What a contrast all this to the indefeasible majesty of Charlemagne ; to his courage and presence of mind, which always rose with the occasion , and, above all, to his promptitude of winning eloquence, that promptum ac profuens genus sermonis, which caused him to be accounted avi sui eloquentissimus !

Passing for a moment to minor accomplishments, we find that Charlemagne excelled in athletic and gymnastic exercises ; he was a pancratist. Bonaparte wanted those even which were essential to his own daily security. Charlemagne swam well ; Bonaparte not at all Charlemagne was a first-rate horseman even amongst the Franks ; Napoleon rode ill originally, and no practice availed to give him a firm seat, a graceful equestrian deportment, or a skilful bridle hand. In a barbarous age the one possessed all the elegancies and ornamental accomplishments of a gentleman :

<sup>1</sup> Some people may fancy that this scene of that day's drama was got up merely to save appearances by a semblance of discussion, and that in effect it mattered not how the performance was conducted where all was scenical, and the ultimate reliance, after all, on the bayonet. But it is certain that this view is erroneous, and that the final decision of the soldiery, even up to the very moment of the crisis, was still doubtful. Some time after this exhibition, “the hesitation reigning among the troops,” says Bourrienne, “still continued.” And in reality it was a mere accident of pantomime, and a clap-trap of sentiment, which finally gave a sudden turn in Napoleon's favour to their wavering resolutions.

the other, in a most polished age, and in a nation of even false refinement, was the sole barbarian of his time; presenting in his deficiencies the picture of a low mechanic, and in his positive qualities the violence and brutality of a savage.<sup>1</sup> Hence, by the way, the extreme folly of those who have attempted to trace a parallel between Napoleon and the first Cæsar. The heaven-born Julius, as beyond all dispute the greatest man of ancient history in moral grandeur, and therefore raised unspeakably above comparison with one who was eminent, even amongst ordinary men, for the pectiness of his passions, so also, upon an intellectual trial, will be found to challenge pretty nearly an equal precedency. Meantime, allowing for the inequality of their advantages, even Cæsar would not have disdained a comparison with Charlemagne. All the knowledge current in Rome, Athens, or Rhodes, at the period of Cæsar's youth, the entire cycle of a nobleman's education in a republic where all noblemen were from their birth dedicated to public services, this— together with much and various knowledge peculiar to himself and his own separate objects—had Cæsar mastered, whilst, in an age of science, and in a country where the fundamental science of mathematics was generally diffused in unrivalled perfection, it is well ascertained that Bonaparte's knowledge did not go beyond an elementary acquaintance with the first six books of Euclid; but, on the other hand, Charlemagne, even in that early age, was familiar with the intricate mathematics and the elaborate computus of Practical Astronomy.

But these collations, it will be said, are upon questions not primarily affecting their peculiar functions. They are

<sup>1</sup> We have occasionally such expressions as Dryden's—"When wild in woods the noble savage ran." These descriptions rest upon false conceptions, in fact, no such combination anywhere exists as a man having the training of a savage, or occupying the exposed and naked situation of a savage, who is at the same time in any moral sense at liberty to be noble-minded. Men are moulded by the circumstances in which they stand habitually, and the insecurity of savage life, by making it impossible to forgo any sort of advantages, obliterates the very idea of honour. Hence, with all savages alike, the point of honour lies in teachery, in stratagem, and the utmost excess of what is dishonourable according to the estimate of cultivated man questions more or less extrajudicial. The true point of comparison is upon the talents of policy in the first place, and strategies in the second. A trial between two celebrated performers in these departments is at any rate difficult; and much more so when they are separated by vast intervals of time. Allowances must be made, so many and so various, compensations or balances struck upon so many diversities of situation; there is so much difference in the modes of warfare—offensive and defensive; the financial means, the available alliances, and other resources, are with so much difficulty appraised, in order to raise ourselves to that station from which the whole question can be overlooked,—that nothing short of a general acquaintance with the history, statistics, and diplomacy of the two periods can lay a ground for the solid adjudication of so large a comparison. Meantime, in the absence of such an investigation, pursued upon a scale of suitable proportions, what if we should sketch a rapid outline (ὡς ἐν τυπῇ περιλάβειν) of its elements (to speak by a metaphor borrowed from practical astronomy)—i. e. of the principal and most conspicuous points which its path would traverse? How much these two men, each central to a mighty system in his own days, how largely and essentially they differed, whether in kind or in degree of merit, will appear in the course even of the hastiest sketch. The circumstances in which they agreed, and that these were sufficient to challenge an inquiry into their characteristic differences, and to support the interest of such an inquiry, will probably be familiar to most readers, as among the commonplaces of general history which survive even in the daily records of conversation. Few people can fail to know that each of these memorable men stood at the head of a new era in European History, and of a great movement in the social development of nations; that each laid the foundations for a new dynasty in his own family, the one by building forwards upon a basis already formed by his two immediate progenitors, the other by dexterously applying to a great political crisis his own military preponderance; and, finally, that each forfeited within a very brief period—the one in his own person, the other in the persons of his immediate descendants—the giddy ascent which he had mastered, and all the distinctions which it conferred ; in short, that "Time, which gave, did his own gifts confound,"<sup>1</sup> but with this mighty difference—that Time co-operated in the one case with extravagant folly in the individual, and in the other with the irresistible decrees of Providence.

Napoleon Bonaparte and Charlemagne were both, in a memorable degree, the favourites of fortune. It is true that the latter found himself by inheritance in possession of a throne which the other ascended by the fortunate use of his own military advantages. But the throne of Charlemagne had been recently won by his family, and in a way so nearly corresponding to that which was afterwards pursued by Napoleon that in effect, considering how little this usurpation had been hallowed by time, the throne might in each case, if not won precisely on the same terms, be considered to be held by the same tenure. Charlemagne, not less than Napoleon, was the privileged child of Revolution ; he was required by the times, and indispensable to the crisis which had arisen for the Franks ; and he was himself protected by the necessities to which he ministered. Clouds had risen, or were rising, at that era, on every quarter of France ; from every side she was menaced by hostile demonstrations ; and, without the counsels of a Charlemagne, and with an energy of action inferior to his, it is probable that she would have experienced misfortunes which, whilst they depressed herself, could not but have altered the destinies of Christendom for many ages to come. The resources of France, it is true, were immense ; and, as regarded the positions of her enemies, they were admirably concentrated. But, to be made available in the whole extent which the times demanded, it was essential that they should be wielded by a first-rate statesman, supported by a first-rate soldier. The statesman and the soldier were fortunately found united in the person of one man, and that man, by the rarest of combinations, the same who was clothed with the supreme power of the state. Less power, or power less harmonious, or power the most consummate administered with less absolute skill, would doubtless have been found incompetent to struggle with the tempestuous assaults which then lowered over the entire frontier of France. It was natural, and, upon the known constitution of human nature, pretty nearly inevitable, that, in the course of the very extended warfare which followed, love for that glorious trade—so irritating and so contagious—should be largely developed in a mind as aspiring as Charlemagne's, and stirred by such generous sensibilities. Yet is it in no one instance recorded that these sympathies with the pomp and circumstance of war moved him to undertake so much as a single campaign, or an expedition which was not otherwise demanded by his judgment, or that they interfered even to bias or give an impulse to his judgment where it had previously wavered. In every case he tried the force of negotiation before he appealed to arms; nay, sometimes he condescended so far in his love of peace as to attempt purchasing with gold rights or concessions of expediency which he knew himself in a situation amply to extort by arms. Nor, where these courses were unavailing, and where peace was no longer to be maintained by any sacrifices, is it ever found that Charlemagne, in adopting the course of war, suffered himself to pursue it as an end valuable in and for itself. And yet that is a result not uncommon; for a long and conscientious resistance to a measure originally tempting to the feelings, once being renounced as utterly unavailing, not seldom issues in a headlong surrender of the heart to purposes so violently thwarted for a time. And, even as a means, war was such in the eyes of Charlemagne to something beyond the customary ends of victory and domestic security. Of all conquerors whose history is known sufficiently to throw light upon their motives, Charlemagne is the only one who looked forward to the benefit of those he conquered as a principal element amongst the fruits of conquest. "Doubtless," says his present biographer, "to defend his own infringed territory, and to punish the aggressors, formed a part of his design; but, beyond that, he aimed at civilizing a people whose barbarism had been for centuries the curse of the neighbouring countries, and at the same time communicating to the cruel savages, who shed the blood of their enemies less in the battle than in the sacrifice, the bland and mitigating spirit of the Christian Religion."

<sup>1</sup> Shakspeare's Sonnets.

This applies more particularly and circumstantially to his Saxon campaigns ; but the spirit of the remark is of general application. At that time a weak light of literature was beginning to diffuse improvement in Italy, in France, and in England. France, by situation geographically, and politically by the prodigious advantage (which she exclusively enjoyed) of an undivided government, with the benefit consequently of an entire unity in her counsels, was peculiarly fitted for communicating the blessings of intellectual culture to the rest of the European continent, and for sustaining the great mission of civilizing conquest. Above all, as the great central depository of Christian knowledge, she seemed specially stationed by Providence as a martial apostle for carrying by the sword that mighty blessing which, even in an earthly sense, Charlemagne could not but value as the best engine of civilisation, to the potent infidel nations on her southern and eastern frontier. A vast revolution was at hand for Europe ; all her tribes were destined to be fused in a new crucible, to be recast in happier moulds, and to form one family of enlightened nations, to compose one great collective brotherhood, united by the tie of a common faith and a common hope, and hereafter to be known to the rest of the world, and to proclaim this unity, under the comprehensive name of Christendom. Baptism, therefore, was the indispensable condition and forerunner of civilisation ; and, from the peculiar ferocity and the sanguinary superstitions which disfigured the Pagan nations in Central Europe, of which the leaders and the nearest to France were the Saxons, and from the bigotry and arrogant intolerance of the Moham-medan nations who menaced her Spanish frontier, it was evident that by the sword only it was possible that baptism should be effectually propagated. War, therefore, for the highest purposes of peace, became the present and instant policy of France : bloodshed for the sake of a religion the most benign ; and desolation with a view to permanent security. The Frankish Emperor was thus invited to indulge in this most captivating of luxuries—the royal tiger-hunt of war,—as being also at this time, and for a special purpose, the sternest of duties. He had a special dispensation for wielding at times a barbarian and exterminating sword, but for the extermination of barbarism ; and he was privileged to be in a single instance an Attila, in order that Attilas might no more arise. Simply as the enemies, bitter and perfidious, of France, the Saxons were a legitimate object of war ; as the standing enemies of civilisation, who would neither receive it for themselves, nor tolerate its peaceable enjoyment in others, they and Charlemagne stood opposed to each other as it were by hostile instincts ; and this most merciful of conquerors was fully justified in departing for once, and in such a quarrel, from his general rule of conduct. And, for a paramount purpose of comprehensive service to all mankind, we entirely agree with Mr. James that Charlemagne had a sufficient plea, and that he has been censured only by calumnious libellers, or by the feeble-minded, for applying a Roman severity of punishment to treachery continually repeated. The question is one purely of policy, and it may be, as Mr. James is disposed to think, that in point of judgment the emperor erred ; but certainly the case was one of great difficulty ; for the very infirmity even of maternal indulgence, if obstinately and continually abused, must find its ultimate limit ; and we have no right to suppose that Charlemagne made his election for the harsher course without a violent self-conflict. His former conduct towards those very people, his infinite forbearance, his long-suffering, his monitory threats, all make it a duty to presume that he suffered the acutest pangs in deciding upon a vindictive punishment ; that he adopted this course as being virtually by its consequences the least sanguinary ; and, finally, that, if he erred, it was not through his heart, but by resisting its very strongest impulses

It is remarkable that both Charlemagne and Bonaparte succeeded as by inheritance to one great element of their enormous power. each found ready to his hands that vast development of martial enthusiasm upon which, as its first condition, their victorious career reposed. Each also found the great armoury of resources opened which such a spirit, diffused over so vast a territory, must in any age insure. Of Charlemagne, in an age when as yet the use of infantry was but imperfectly known, it may be said symbolically that he found the universal people, patrician and plebeian, chieftain and vassal, with the left foot in the stirrup<sup>1</sup>; of Napoleon, in an age when the use of artillery was first understood, that he found every man standing to his gun. Both, in short, found war in procinctu · both found the people whom they governed willing to support the privations and sacrifices which war imposes. hungering and thirsting for its glories, its pomps and triumphs; entering even with lively sympathy of pleasure into its hardships and its trials; and thus, from within and from without, prepared for military purposes. So far both had the same good fortune<sup>2</sup>; neither had much merit. The enthusiasm of Napoleon's days was the birth of republican sentiments, and built on a reaction of civic and patriotic ardour. In the very plenitude of their rage against kings, the French Republic were threatened with attack, and with the desolation of their capital by a banded crusade of kings, and they rose in frenzy to meet the aggressors. The Allied Powers had themselves kindled the popular excitement which provoked this vast development of martial power amongst the French, and first brought their own wallike strength within their own knowledge. In the days of Charlemagne the same martial character was the result of ancient habits and training, encouraged and effect-

<sup>1</sup> Or perhaps the right, for the Prussian cavalry (who drew their custom from some regiments in the service of Gustavus Adolphus, and they again traditionally from others) are always trained to mount in this way.

<sup>2</sup> It is painful to any man of honourable feeling that, whilst a great rival nation is pursuing the ennobling profession of arms, his own should be reproached contemptuously with a sordid dedication to commerce. However, on the one hand, things are not always as they seem. Commerce has its ennobling effects, direct or indirect; with its barbarizing degradations. And, on the other hand, the facts even are not exactly as prima facie they were supposed, for the truth is that, in proportion to its total population, England had more men in arms during the last war than France. But, generally speaking, the case may be stated thus · the British nation is, by original constitution of mind, and by long enjoyment of liberty, a far nobler people than the French. And hence we see the reason and the necessity that the French should, with a view to something like a final balance in the effect, be trained to a nobler profession. Compensations are everywhere produced or encouraged by nature and by providence; and a nobler discipline in the one nation is doubtless some equilibrium to a nobler nature in the other.

ally organized by the energy of the aspiring mayors of the palace, or great lieutenants of the Merovingian Kings.

But, agreeing in this, that they were indebted to others for the martial spirit which they found, and that both turned to their account a power not created by themselves, Charlemagne and Napoleon differed, however, in the utmost possible extent as to the final application of their borrowed advantages. Napoleon applied them to purposes the very opposite of those which had originally given them birth. Nothing less than patriotic ardour in defence of what had at one time appeared to be the cause of civil liberty could have availed to evoke those mighty hosts which gathered in the early years of the Revolution on the German and Italian frontiers of France. Yet were these hosts applied, under the perfect despotism of Napoleon, to the final extinction of liberty; and the armies of Jacobinism, who had gone forth on a mission of liberation for Europe, were at last employed in riveting the chains of their compatriots, and forging others for the greater part of Christendom. Far otherwise was the conduct of Charlemagne. The Frankish government, though we are not circumstantially acquainted with its forms, is known to have been tempered by a large infusion of popular influence. This is proved, as Mr. James observes, by the deposition of Chilperic; by the grand national assemblies of the Champ de Mars; and by other great historical facts. Now, the situation of Charlemagne,—successor to a throne already firmly established, and in his own person a mighty amplifier of its glories, and a leader in whom the Franks had unlimited confidence,—threw into his hands an unexampled power of modifying the popular restraints upon himself in any degree he might desire.

“Nunquam libertas gratior exit,
Quam sub rege pio”—

is the general doctrine. But, as to the Franks in particular, if they resembled their modern representatives in their most conspicuous moral feature, it would be more true to say that the bribe and the almost magical seduction for them, capable of charming away their sternest resolutions, and of relaxing the hand of the patriot when grasping his noblest birthright, has ever lain in great military success, in the power of bringing victory to the national standards, and in continued offerings on the altar of public vanity. In their estimate for above a thousand years, it has been found true that the harvest of a few splendid campaigns, reaped upon the fields of neighbouring nations, far outweighs any amount of humbler blessings in the shape of civil and political privileges. Charlemagne, as a conqueror, and by far the greatest illustrator of the Frankish name, might easily have conciliated their gratitude and admiration into a surrender of popular rights ; or, profiting by his high situation, and the confidence reposed in him, he might have undermined their props ; or, by a direct exertion of his power, he might have preemptorily resumed them. Slowly and surely, or summarily and with violence, this great emperor had the national privileges in his power. But the beneficence of his purposes required no such aggression on the rights of his subjects. War brought with it naturally some extension of power, and a military jurisdiction is necessarily armed with some discretionary licence. But, in the civil exercise of his authority, the Emperor was content with the powers awarded to him by law and custom. His great schemes of policy were all of a nature to prepare his subjects for a condition of larger political influence ; he could not in consistency be adverse to an end towards which he so anxiously prepared the means. And it is certain that, although some German writers have attempted to fasten upon Charlemagne a charge of vexatious inquisition into the minor police of domestic life, and into petty details of economy below the majesty of his official character, even their vigilance of research, sharpened by malice, has been unable to detect, throughout his long reign, and in the hurry of sudden exigencies natural to a state of uninterrupted warfare and alarm, one single act of tyranny, personal revenge, or violation of the existing laws. Charlemagne, like Napoleon, had bitter enemies : some who were such to his government and his public purposes ; some again to his person upon motives of private revenge. Tassilo, for example, the Duke of Bavaria, and Desiderius, the King of the Lombards, acted against him upon the bitterest instigations of feminine resentment ; each of these princes, conceiving himself concerned in a family quarrel, pursued the cause which he had adopted in the most ferocious spirit of revenge, and would undoubtedly have inflicted death upon Charlemagne, had he fallen into their power. Of this he must himself have been sensible, and yet, when the chance of war threw both of them into his power, he forbore to exercise even those rights of retaliation for their many provocations which the custom of that age sanctioned universally: he neither mutilated nor deprived them of sight. Confinement to religious seclusion was all that he inflicted; and, in the case of Tassilo, where mercy could be more safely exercised, he pardoned him so often that it became evident in what current his feelings ran wherever the cruel necessities of the public service allowed him to indulge them.

In the conspiracy formed against him upon the provocations offered to the Frankish nobility by his third wife, he showed the same spirit of excessive clemency, a clemency which again reminds us of the first Cæsar, and which was not merely parental, but often recalls to us the long-suffering and tenderness of spirit which belong to the infirmity of maternal affection. Here are no Palms,<sup>1</sup> executed for no real offence known to the laws of their country, and without a trial such as any laws in any country would have conceded: no innocent D'Enghien,<sup>2</sup> murdered, without the shadow of provocation, and purely on account of his own reversionary rights; not for doing or meditating wrong, but because the claims which unfortunately he inherited might by possibility become available in his person; not, therefore, even as an enemy by intention or premeditation; not even as an apparent competitor, but in the rare character of a competitor presumptive,—one who might become an ideal competitor by the extinction of a whole family, and even then no substantial competitor until after a revolution in France which must already have undermined the throne of Bonaparte. To his own subjects, and his own kinsmen, never did Charlemagne forget to be, in acts as well as words, a parent.

<sup>1</sup> John Philip Palm, shot by Bonaparte's orders, August 26, 1806 —M

<sup>2</sup> The Bourbon Duke d'Enghien, shot by Bonaparte's orders, March 21, 1804 —M.

In his foreign relations, it is true, for one single purpose of effectual warning, Charlemagne put forth a solitary trait of Roman harshness. This is the case which we have already noticed and defended; and, with a view to the comparison with Napoleon, remarkable enough it is that the numbers sacrificed on this occasion are pretty nearly the same as on the celebrated massacre at Jaffa, perpetrated by Napoleon in Council<sup>1</sup>. In the Saxon, as in the Syrian massacre, the numbers were between four and five thousand: not that the numbers or the scale of the transaction can affect its principle; but it is well to know it, because then to its author, as now to us who sit as judges upon it, that circumstance cannot be supposed to have failed in drawing the very keenest attention to its previous consideration. A butchery that was in a numerical sense so vast cannot be supposed to have escaped its author in a hurry, or to be open to any of the usual palliations from precipitance or inattention. Charlemagne and Napoleon must equally be presumed to have regarded this act on all sides, to have weighed it in and for itself, and to have traversed by anticipation the whole sum of its consequences. In the one case we find a general, the leader of a soi-disant Christian army, the representative of the "most Christian" nation, and, as amongst infidels, specially charged with the duty of supporting the sanctity of Christian good faith, unfortunately pledged by his own most confidential and accredited agents, in a moment of weakness, to a promise which he, the commander-in-chief, regarded as ruinous. This promise, fatal to Napoleon's honour, and tarnishing for many a year to the Christian name, guaranteed "quarter" to a large body of Turkish troops, having arms in their hands, and otherwise well able to have made a desperate defence. Such a promise was peculiarly embarrassing; provisions ran short, and, to detain them as prisoners would draw murmurs from his own troops, now suffering hardships themselves. On the other hand, to have turned them adrift would have insured their speedy reappearance as active enemies to a diminished and debilitated army ; for, as to sending them off by sea, that measure was impracticable, as well from want of shipping as from the presence of the English. Such was the dilemma, doubtless perplexing enough, but not more so than in ten thousand other cases, for which their own appropriate ten thousand remedies have been found. What was the issue ? The entire body of gallant soldiers, disarmed upon the faith of a solemn guarantee from a Christian general, standing in the very steps of the noble (and the more noble because bigoted) Crusaders, were all mowed down by the musketry of their thrice accursed enemy ; and, by way of crowning treachery with treachery, some few who had swum off to a point of rock in the sea were lured back to destruction under a second series of promises, violated almost at the very instant when uttered. A larger or more damnable murder does not stain the memory of any brigand, buccaneer, or pirate ; nor has any army,—Huns, Vandals, or Mogul Tartars,—ever polluted itself by so base a perfidy ; for, in this memorable tragedy the whole army were accomplices. Now, as to Charlemagne, he had tried the effect of forgiveness and lenity often in vain. Clemency was misinterpreted ; it had been, and it would be, construed into conscious weakness. Under these circumstances, with a view undoubtedly to the final extinction of rebellions which involved infinite bloodshed on both sides, he permitted one trial to be made of a severe and sanguinary chastisement. It failed ; insurrections proceeded as before, and it was not repeated. But the main difference in the principle of the two cases is this,—that Charlemagne had exacted no penalty but one which the laws of war in that age conferred, and even in this age the laws of allegiance. However bloody, therefore, this tragedy was no murder. It was a judicial punishment, built upon known acts and admitted laws, designed in mercy, consented to unwillingly, and finally repented. Lastly, instead of being one in a multitude of acts bearing the same character, it stood alone in a long career of intercourse with wild and ferocious nations, owning no control but that of the spear and sword.

<sup>1</sup> "In council," we say purposely and in candour, for the only pleas in palliation ever set up by Napoleon's apologists are these two necessity, the devil's plea, in the first place; secondly, that the guilt of the transaction, whether more or less, was divided amongst the general and the several members of his council.

Many are the points of comparison, and some of them remarkable enough, in the other circumstances of the two careers, separated by a thousand years. Both effected the passage of the Great St Bernard<sup>1</sup>; but the one in an age when mechanical forces, and the aids of art, were yet imperfectly developed; the other in an age when science had armed the arts of war and of locomotion with the fabulous powers of the Titans, and with the whole resources of a mighty nation at his immediate disposal. Both, by means of this extraordinary feat, achieved the virtual conquest of Lombardy in an hour; but Charlemagne, without once risking the original impression of this coup-d'éclat, Napoleon, on the other hand, so entirely squandering and forfeiting his own success that in the battle which followed he was at first utterly defeated, and, but for the blunder of his enemy, and the sudden aid of an accomplished friend, irretrievably. Both suffered politically by the repudiation of a wife, but Charlemagne, under adequate provocation, and with no final result of evil; Bonaparte under heavy aggravations of ingratitude and indiscretion. Each assumed the character of a patron to learning and learned men; but Napoleon in an age when knowledge of every kind was self-patronized, when no possible exertions of power could avail to crush it, and yet, under these circumstances, with utter insincerity; Charlemagne, on the other hand, at a time when the countenance of a powerful protector made the whole difference between revival and a long extinction, and,—what was still more to the purpose of doing honour to his memory,—not merely in a spirit of sincerity, but of fervid activity. Not content with drawing counsel and aid from the cells of Northumberland, even in the short time which he passed at Rome he had “collected a number of grammarians (that is, littérateurs) and arithmeticians, the poor remains of the “orators and philosophers of the past, and engaged them to “accompany him from Italy to France.”

<sup>1</sup> And from the fact of that coips in Charlemagne's army which effected the passage having been commanded by his uncle, Duke Bernard, this mountain, previously known as the Mons Jovis (and, by corruption, Mont le Joux), very justly obtained the more modern name which it still retains.

What resulted in each case from these great efforts and prodigious successes? Each failed in laying the foundations of any permanent inheritance to his own glory in his own family. But Bonaparte lived to lay in ruins even his personal interest in this great edifice of empire, and that entirely by his own desperate presumption, precipitance, and absolute defect of self-command, Charlemagne, on his part, lost nothing of what he had gained. If his posterity did not long maintain the elevation to which he had raised them, that did but the more proclaim the grandeur of the mind which had reared a colossal empire, that sank under any powers inferior to his own. If the empire itself lost its unity, and divided into sections, even thus it did not lose the splendour and prosperity of its separate parts; and the praise remains entire—let succeeding princes, as conservators, have failed as much and as excusably as they might—that he erected the following splendid empire—the whole of France and Belgium, with their natural boundaries of the Alps, the Pyrenees, the Ocean, the Mediterranean; to the south, Spain between the Ebro and the Pyrenees; and, to the north, the whole of Germany, up to the banks of the Elbe. Italy, as far as the lower Calabria, was either governed by his son, or tributary to his crown; Dalmatia, Croatia, Liburnia, and Istria (with the exception of the maritime cities), were joined to the territories, which he had himself conquered, of Hungary and Bohemia. As far as the conflux of the Danube with the Teyss and the Save, the East of Europe acknowledged his power. Most of the Slavonian tribes between the Elbe and the Vistula paid tribute and professed obedience; and Corsica and Sardinia, with the Balearic Islands, were dependent upon his possessions in Italy and Spain.

His moral were yet greater than his territorial conquests: in the eloquent language of his present historian, “he snatched from darkness all the lands he conquered; and may be said to have added the whole of Germany to the world.” Wherever he moved, civilisation followed his footsteps. What he conquered was emphatically the conquest of his own genius; and his vast empire was, in a peculiar sense, his own creation. And that which, under general circumstances, would have exposed the hollowness and insufficiency of his establishment was for him in particular the seal and attestation of his extraordinary grandeur of mind. His empire dissolved after he had departed; his dominions lost their cohesion, and slipped away from the nerveless hands which succeeded,—a sufficient evidence, were there no other, that all the vast resources of the Frankish throne, wielded by imbecile minds, were inadequate to maintain that which, in the hands of a Charlemagne, they had availed to conquer and cement.

JOAN OF ARC<sup>1</sup>

WHAT is to be thought of her? What is to be thought of the poor shepherd girl from the hills and forests of Lorraine, that—like the Hebrew shepherd boy from the hills and forests of Judea—rose suddenly out of the quiet, out of the safety, out of the religious inspiration, rooted in deep pastoral solitudes, to a station in the van of armies, and to the more perilous station at the right hand of kings? The Hebrew boy inaugurated his patriotic mission by an act, by a victorious act, such as no man could deny. But so did the girl of Lorraine, if we read her story as it was read by those <sup>1</sup> “Arc” :—Modern France, that should know a great deal better than myself, insists that the name is not D’Arc—i.e. of Arc—but Darc. Now it happens sometimes that, if a person whose position guarantees his access to the best information will content himself with gloomy dogmatism, striking the table with his fist, and saying in a terrific voice “It is so, and there’s an end of it,” one bows deferentially, and submits. But, if, unhappily for himself, won by this docility, he relents too amiably into reasons and arguments, probably one raises an insurrection against him that may never be crushed, for in the fields of logic one can skirmish, perhaps, as well as he. Had he confined himself to dogmatism, he would have entrenched his position in darkness, and have hidden his own vulnerable points. But, coming down to base reasons, he lets in light, and one sees where to plant the blows. Now, the worshipful reason of modern France for disturbing the old received spelling is that Jean Hordal, a descendant of La Pucelle’s brother, spelled the name Darc in 1612. But what of that? It is notorious that what small matter of spelling Providence had thought fit to disburse amongst man in the seventeenth century was all monopolised by printers: now, M. Hordal was not a printer.

[Appeared originally in Tait’s Magazine for March and August 1847; reprinted by De Quincey in 1854, in the third volume of his Collected Writings.—M.]

who saw her nearest. Adverse armies bore witness to the boy as no pretender; but so they did to the gentle girl. Judged by the voices of all who saw them from a station of good-will, both were found true and loyal to any promises involved in their first acts. Enemies it was that made the difference between their subsequent fortunes. The boy rose to a splendour and a noonday prosperity, both personal and public, that rang through the records of his people, and became a by-word amongst his posterity for a thousand years, until the sceptre was departing from Judah. The poor, forsaken girl, on the contrary, drank not herself from that cup of rest which she had secured for France. She never sang together with the songs that rose in her native Domrémy as echoes to the departing steps of invaders. She mingled not in the festal dances at Vaucouleurs which celebrated in rapture the redemption of France. No! for her voice was then silent; no! for her feet were dust. Pure, innocent, noble-hearted girl! whom, from earliest youth, ever I believed in as full of truth and self-sacrifice, this was amongst the strongest pledges for thy truth, that never once—no, not for a moment of weakness—didst thou revel in the vision of coronets and honour from man. Coronets for thee! Oh no! Honours, if they come when all is over, are for those that share thy blood.<sup>1</sup> Daughter of Domrémy, when the gratitude of thy king shall awaken, thou wilt be sleeping the sleep of the dead. Call her, King of France, but she will not hear thee. Cite her by the apparitors to come and receive a robe of honour, but she will be found en contumace. When the thunders of universal France, as even yet may happen, shall proclaim the grandeur of the poor shepherd girl that gave up all for her country, thy ear, young shepherd girl, will have been deaf for five centuries. To suffer and to do, that was thy portion in this life, that was thy destiny; and not for a moment was it hidden from thyself. Life, thou saidst, is short; and the sleep which is in the grave is long; let me use that life, so transitory, for the glory of those heavenly dreams destined to comfort the sleep which is so long! This pure creature—pure from every suspicion of even a visionary self-interest, even as she was pure in senses more obvious—never once did this holy child, as regarded herself, relax from her belief in the darkness that was travelling to meet her. She might not prefigure the very manner of her death; she saw not in vision, perhaps, the aerial altitude of the fiery scaffold, the spectators without end on every road pouring into Rouen as to a coronation, the surging smoke, the volleying flames, the hostile faces all around, the pitying eye that lurked but here and there, until nature and imperishable truth broke loose from artificial restraints;—these might not be apparent through the mists of the hurrying future. But the voice that called her to death, that she heard for ever

<sup>1</sup> “Those that share thy blood”.—A collateral relative of Joanna’s was subsequently ennobled by the title of Du Lys

Great was the throne of France even in those days, and great was he that sat upon it: but well Joanna knew that not the throne, nor he that sat upon it, was for her; but, on the contrary, that she was for them; not she by them, but they by her, should rise from the dust. Gorgeous were the lilies of France, and for centuries had the privilege to spread their beauty over land and sea, until, in another century, the wrath of God and man combined to wither them; but well Joanna knew, early at Domrény she had read that bitter truth, that the lilies of France would decorate no garland for her. Flower nor bud, bell nor blossom, would ever bloom for her!

But stay. What reason is there for taking up this subject of Joanna precisely in the spring of 1847? Might it not have been left till the spring of 1947, or, perhaps, left till called for? Yes, but it is called for, and clamorously. You are aware, reader, that amongst the many original thinkers whom modern France has produced one of the reputed leaders is M. Michelet. All these writers are of a revolutionary cast: not in a political sense merely, but in all senses; mad, oftentimes, as March hares; crazy with the laughing gas of recovered liberty; drunk with the wine-cup of their mighty Revolution, snorting, whinnying, throwing up their heels, like wild horses in the boundless Pampas, and running races of defiance with snipes, or with the winds, or with their own shadows, if they can find nothing else to challenge. Some time or other I, that have leisure to read, may introduce you, that have not, to two or three dozen of these writers; of whom I can assure you beforehand that they are often profound, and at intervals are even as impassioned as if they were come of our best English blood. But now, confining our attention to M. Michelet, we in England—who know him best by his worst book, the book against priests, &c—know him disadvantageously. That book is a rhapsody of incoherence. But his “History of France” is quite another thing. A man, in whatsoever craft he sails, cannot stretch away out of sight when he is linked to the windings of the shore by towing-ropes of History Facts, and the consequences of facts, draw the writer back to the falconer’s lure from the giddiest heights of speculation. Here, therefore—in his “France”—if not always free from flightiness, if now and then off like a rocket for an airy wheel in the clouds, M. Michelet, with natural politeness, never forgets that he has left a large audience waiting for him on earth, and gazing upwards in anxiety for his return—return, therefore, he does. But History, though clear of certain temptations in one direction, has separate dangers of its own. It is impossible so to write a history of France, or of England—works becoming every hour more indispensable to the inevitably-political man of this day—without perilous openings for error. If I, for instance, on the part of England, should happen to turn my labours into that channel, and (on the model of Lord Percy going to Chevy Chase)

“A vow to God should make
My pleasure in the Michelet woods Three summer days to take,”

probably, from simple delirium, I might hunt M. Michelet into delirium tremens. Two strong angels stand by the side of History, whether French History or English, as heraldic supporters: the angel of research on the left hand, that must read millions of dusty parchments, and of pages blotted with lies; the angel of meditation on the right hand, that must cleanse these lying records with fire, even as of old the draperies of asbestos were cleansed, and must quicken them into regenerated life. Willingly I acknowledge that no man will ever avoid innumerable errors of detail, with so vast a compass of ground to traverse, this is impossible; but such errors (though I have a bushel on hand, at M. Michelet's service) are not the game I chase; it is the bitter and unfair spirit in which M. Michelet writes against England. Even that, after all, is but my secondary object, the real one is Joanna, the Pucelle d'Orleans for herself.

I am not going to write the history of La Pucelle to do this, or even circumstantially to report the history of her persecution and bitter death, of her struggle with false witnesses and with ensnaring judges, it would be necessary to have before us all the documents, and therefore the collection only now forthcoming in Paris.<sup>1</sup> But my purpose is narrower. There have been great thinkers, disdaining the careless judgments of contemporaries, who have thrown themselves boldly on the judgment of a far posterity, that should have had time to review, to ponder, to compare. There have been great actors on the stage of tragic humanity that might, with the same depth of confidence, have appealed from the levity of compatriot friends—too heartless for the sublime interest of their story, and too impatient for the labour of sifting its perplexities—to the magnanimity and justice of enemies. To this class belongs the Maid of Arc. The ancient Romans were too faithful to the ideal of grandeur in themselves not to relent, after a generation or two, before the grandeur of Hannibal. Mithridates, a more doubtful person, yet, merely for the magic perseverance of his indomitable malice, won from the same Romans the only real honour that ever he received on earth. And we English have ever shown the same homage to stubborn enmity. To work unflinchingly for the ruin of England; to say through life, by word and by deed, Delenda est Anglia Victrix!—that one purpose of malice, faithfully pursued, has quartered some people upon our national funds of homage as by a perpetual annuity. Better than an inheritance of service rendered to

<sup>1</sup> "Only now forthcoming".—In 1817 began the publication (from official records) of Joanna's trial. It was interrupted, I fear, by the convulsions of 1848; and whether even yet finished I do not know. [The reference seems to be to Quicherat. Procès de condamnation et réhabilitation de Jeanne d'Arc, in 5 volumes, Paris 1841-9.—M.]

England herself has sometimes proved the most insane hatred to England. Hyder Ali, even his son Tippoo, though so far inferior, and Napoleon, have all benefited by this disposition amongst ourselves to exaggerate the merit of diabolic enmity. Not one of these men was ever capable, in a solitary instance, of praising an enemy (what do you say to that, reader ?); and yet, in their behalf, we consent to forget, not their crimes only, but (which is worse) their hideous bigotry and anti-magnanimous egotism,—for nationality it was not. Suffren, and some half-dozen of other French nautical heroes, because rightly they did us all the mischief they could (which was really great), are names justly revered in England. On the same principle, La Pucelle d'Orleans, the victorious enemy of England, has been destined to receive her deepest commemoration from the magnanimous justice of Englishmen.

Joanna, as we in England should call her, but, according to her own statement, Jeanne (or, as M. Michelet asserts, Jean <sup>1</sup>) D'Arc, was born at Domrémy, a village on the marches of Lorraine and Champagne, and dependent upon the town of Vaucouleurs. I have called her a Lorrainer, not simply because the word is prettier, but because Champagne too odiously reminds us English of what are for us imaginary wines,—which, undoubtedly, La Pucelle tasted as rarely as we English: we English, because the Champagne of London is chiefly grown in Devonshire; La Pucelle, because the Champagne of Champagne never, by any chance, flowed into the fountain of Domrémy, from which only she drank M Michelet will have her to be a Champenoise, and for no better reason than that she "took after her father," who happened to be a Champenois.

<sup>1</sup> “Jean” :—M. Michelet asserts that there was a mystical meaning at that era in calling a child Jean, it implied a secret commendation of a child, if not a dedication, to St John the evangelist, the beloved disciple, the apostle of love and mysterious visions. But, really, as the name was so exceedingly common, few people will detect a mystery in calling a boy by the name of Jack, though it does seem mysterious to call a girl Jack. It may be less so in France, where a beautiful practice has always prevailed of giving a boy his mother's name—preceded and strengthened by a male name, as Charles Anne, Victor Victoire. In cases where a mother's memory has been unusually dear to a son, this vocal memento of her, locked into the circle of his own name, gives to it the tenderness of a testamentary relique, or a funeral ring. I presume, therefore, that La Pucelle must have borne the baptismal name of Jeanne Jean, the latter with no reference, perhaps, to so sublime a person as St. John, but simply to some relative.

These disputes, however, turn on refinements too nice Domrémy stood upon the frontiers, and, like other frontiers, produced a mixed race, representing the cis and the trans. A river (it is true) formed the boundary-line at this point—the river Meuse; and that, in old days, might have divided the populations; but in these days it did not: there were bridges, there were ferries, and weddings crossed from the right bank to the left. Here lay two great roads, not so much for travellers that were few, as for armies that were too many by half. These two roads, one of which was the great high road between France and Germany, decussated at this very point, which is a learned way of saying that they formed a St Andrew's Cross, or letter X. I hope the compositor will choose a good large X; in which case the point of intersection, the locus of conflux and intersection for these four diverging arms, will finish the reader's geographical education, by showing him to a hair's-breadth where it was that Domrémy stood. These roads, so grandly situated, as great trunk arteries between two mighty realms,<sup>1</sup> and haunted for ever by wars or rumours of wars, decussated (for anything I know to the contrary) absolutely under Joanna's bedroom window: one rolling away to the right, past Monsieur D'Arc's old barn, and the other unaccountably preferring to sweep round that odious man's pig-sty to the left.

On whichever side of the border chance had thrown Joanna, the same love to France would have been nurtured. For it is a strange fact, noticed by M Michelet and others, that the Dukes of Bar and Lorraine had for generations pursued the policy of eternal warfare with France on their own account, yet also of eternal amity and league with France in case anybody else presumed to attack her. Let peace settle upon France, and before long you might rely upon seeing the little vixen Lorraine flying at the throat of France. Let

<sup>1</sup> And reminding one of that inscription, so justly admired by Paul Richter, which a Russian Czarina placed on a guide-post near Moscow. This is the road that leads to Constantinople.

France be assailed by a formidable enemy, and instantly you saw a Duke of Lorraine insisting on having his own throat cut in support of France, which favour accordingly was cheerfully granted to him in three great successive battles: twice by the English, viz. at Crécy and Agincourt, once by the Sultan at Nicopolis.

This sympathy with France during great eclipses, in those that during ordinary seasons were always teasing her with brawls and guerilla inroads, strengthened the natural piety to France of those that were confessedly the children of her own house. The outposts of France, as one may call the great frontier provinces, were of all localities the most devoted to the Fleurs de Lys. To witness, at any great crisis, the generous devotion to these lilacs of the little fiery cousin that in gentler weather was for ever tilting at the breast of France, could not but fan the zeal of France's legitimate daughters. whilst to occupy a post of honour on the frontiers against an old hereditary enemy of France would naturally stimulate this zeal by a sentiment of martial pride, by a sense of danger always threatening, and of hatred always smouldering. That great four-headed road was a perpetual memento to patriotic ardour. To say "This way lies the road to Paris, and that other way to Aix-la-Chapelle, this to Prague, that to Vienna," nourished the warfare of the heart by daily ministrations of sense. The eye that watched for the gleams of lance or helmet from the hostile frontier, the ear that listened for the groaning of wheels, made the high-road itself, with its relations to centres so remote, into a manual of patriotic duty.

The situation, therefore, locally, of Joanna was full of profound suggestions to a heart that listened for the stealthy steps of change and fear that too surely were in motion. But, if the place were grand, the time, the burden of the time, was far more so. The air overhead in its upper chambers was hurting with the obscure sound; was dark with sullen fermenting of storms that had been gathering for a hundred and thirty years. The battle of Agincourt in Joanna's childhood had reopened the wounds of France. Crécy and Poitiers, those withering overthrows for the chivalry of France, had, before Agincourt occurred, been tranquillised by more than half-a-century ; but this resurrection of their trumpet wails made the whole series of battles and endless skirmishes take their stations as parts in one drama. The graves that had closed sixty years ago seemed to fly open in sympathy with a sorrow that echoed their own. The monarchy of France laboured in extremity, rocked and reeled like a ship fighting with the darkness of monsoons. The madness of the poor king (Charles VI) falling in at such a crisis, like the case of women labouring in childbirth during the storming of a city, trebled the awfulness of the time. Even the wild story of the incident which had immediately occasioned the explosion of this madness—the case of a man unknown, gloomy, and perhaps maniacal himself, coming out of a forest at noonday, laying his hand upon the bridle of the king's horse, checking him for a moment to say, "Oh, king, thou art betrayed," and then vanishing, no man knew whither, as he had appeared for no man knew what—fell in with the universal prostration of mind that laid France on her knees, as before the slow unweaving of some ancient prophetic doom. The famines, the extraordinary diseases, the insurrections of the peasantry up and down Europe—these were chords struck from the same mysterious harp ; but these were transitory chords. There had been others of deeper and more ominous sound. The termination of the Crusades, the destruction of the Templars, the Papal interdicts, the tragedies caused or suffered by the house of Anjou, and by the Emperor—these were full of a more permanent significance. But, since then, the colossal figure of feudalism was seen standing, as it were on tiptoe, at Crécy, for flight from earth—that was a revolution unparalleled ; yet that was a trifle by comparison with the more fearful revolutions that were mining below the Church. By her own internal schisms, by the abominable spectacle of a double pope—so that no man, except through political bias, could even guess which was Heaven's vicegerent, and which the creature of Hell—the Church was rehearsing, as in still earlier forms she had already rehearsed, those vast rents in her foundations which no man should ever heal.

These were the loftiest peaks of the cloudland in the skies that to the scientific gazer first caught the colours of the new morning in advance. But the whole vast range alike of sweeping glooms overhead dwelt upon all meditative minds, even upon those that could not distinguish the tendencies nor decipher the forms. It was, therefore, not her own age alone as affected by its immediate calamities that lay with such weight upon Joanna's mind, but her own age as one section in a vast mysterious drama, unweaving through a century back, and drawing nearer continually to some dreadful ensis. Cataracts and rapids were heard roaring ahead, and signs were seen far back, by help of old men's memories, which answered secretly to signs now coming forward on the eye, even as locks answer to keys. It was not wonderful that in such a haunted solitude, with such a haunted heart, Joanna should see angelic visions, and hear angelic voices. These voices whispered to her for ever the duty, self-imposed, of delivering France. Five years she listened to these monitory voices with internal struggles. At length she could resist no longer. Doubt gave way; and she left her home for ever in order to present herself at the dauphin's court.

The education of this poor girl was mean according to the present standard: was ineffably grand, according to a purer philosophic standard: and only not good for our age because for us it would be unattainable. She read nothing, for she could not read; but she had heard others read parts of the Roman martyrology. She wept in sympathy with the sad Misereres of the Romish Church, she rose to heaven with the glad triumphant Te Deums of Rome; she drew her comfort and her vital strength from the rites of the same Church. But, next after these spiritual advantages, she eyed most to the advantages of her situation. The fountain of Domrémy was on the brink of a boundless forest, and it was haunted to that degree by fairies that the parish priest (curé) was obliged to read mass there once a-year, in order to keep them in any decent bounds. Fairies are important, even in a statistical view: certain weeds mark poverty in the soil; fairies mark its solitude. As surely as the wolf retires before cities does the fairy sequester herself from the haunts of the licensed victualler. A village is too much for her nervous delicacy: at most, she can tolerate a distant view of a hamlet.

We may judge, therefore, by the uncasiness and extra trouble which they gave to the parson, in what strength the faeries mustered at Domrémy, and, by a satisfactory consequence, how thinly sown with men and women must have been that region even in its inhabited spots. But the forests of Domrémy—those were the glories of the land: for in them abode mysterious powers and ancient secrets that towered into tragic strength. “Abbeys there were, and abbey windows,”—“like Moorish temples of the Hindoos,”—that exercised even princely power both in Lorraine and in the German Diets. These had their sweet bells that pierced the forests for many a league at matins or vespers, and each its own dreamy legend. Few enough, and scattered enough, were these abbeys, so as in no degree to disturb the deep solitude of the region; yet many enough to spread a network or awning of Christian sanctity over what else might have seemed a heathen wilderness. This sort of religious talisman being secured, a man the most afraid of ghosts (like myself, suppose, or the reader) becomes armed into courage to wander for days in their sylvan recesses. The mountains of the Vosges, on the eastern frontier of France, have never attracted much notice from Europe, except in 1813-14 for a few brief months, when they fell within Napoleon’s line of defence against the Allies. But they are interesting for this amongst other features, that they do not, like some loftier ranges, repel woods—the forests and the hills are on sociable terms. Live and let live is their motto. For this reason, in part, these tracts in Lorraine were a favourite hunting-ground with the Carlovingian princes. About six hundred years before Joanna’s childhood, Charlemagne was known to have hunted there. That, of itself, was a grand incident in the traditions of a forest or a chase. In these vast forests, also, were to be found (if anywhere to be found) those mysterious fawns that tempted solitary hunters into visionary and perilous pursuits. Here was seen (if anywhere seen) that ancient stag who was already nine hundred years old, but possibly a hundred or two more, when met by Charlemagne; and the thing was put beyond doubt by the inscription upon his golden collar. I believe Charlemagne knighted the stag; and, if ever he is met again by a king, he ought to be made an earl, or, being upon the marches of France, a marquis. Observe, I don't absolutely vouch for all these things. my own opinion varies. On a fine breezy forenoon I am audaciously sceptical, but as twilight sets in my credulity grows steadily, till it becomes equal to anything that could be desired. And I have heard candid sportsmen declare that, outside of these very forests, they laughed loudly at all the dim tales connected with their haunted solitudes, but, on reaching a spot notoriously eighteen miles deep within them, they agreed with Sir Roger de Coverley that a good deal might be said on both sides.

Such traditions, or any others that (like the stag) connect distant generations with each other, are, for that cause, sublime; and the sense of the shadowy, connected with such appearances that reveal themselves or not according to circumstances, leaves a colouring of sanctity over ancient forests, even in those minds that utterly reject the legend as a fact.

But, apart from all distinct stories of that order, in any solitary frontier between two great empires,—as here, for instance, or in the desert between Syria and the Euphrates,—there is an inevitable tendency, in minds of any deep sensibility, to people the solitudes with phantom images of powers that were of old so vast. Joanna, therefore, in her quiet occupation of a shepherdess, would be led continually to brood over the political condition of her country by the traditions of the past no less than by the mementoes of the local present.

M. Michelet, indeed, says that La Pucelle was not a shepherdess. I beg his pardon: she was. What he rests upon I guess pretty well: it is the evidence of a woman called Haumette, the most confidential friend of Joanna. Now, she is a good witness, and a good girl, and I like her, for she makes a natural and affectionate report of Joanna's ordinary life. But still, however good she may be as a witness, Joanna is better; and she, when speaking to the dauphin, calls herself in the Latin report Bergereta. Even Haumette confesses that Joanna tended sheep in her girlhood. And I believe that, if Miss Haumette were taking coffee alone with me this very evening (February 12, 1847)—in which there would be no subject for scandal or for maiden blushes, because I am an intense philosopher, and Miss H. would be hard upon four hundred and fifty years old—she would admit the following comment upon her evidence to be right. A Frenchman, about forty years ago,—M. Simond, in his “Travels,”—mentions accidentally the following hideous scene as one steadily observed and watched by himself in chivalrous France not very long before the French Revolution.—A peasant was ploughing; and the team that drew his plough was a donkey and a woman. Both were regularly harnessed: both pulled alike. This is bad enough; but the Frenchman adds that, in distributing his lashes, the peasant was obviously desirous of being impartial. or, if either of the yoke-fellows had a right to complain, certainly it was not the donkey.<sup>1</sup> Now, in any country where such degradation of females could be tolerated by the state of manners, a woman of delicacy would shrink from acknowledging, either for herself or her friend, that she had ever been addicted to any mode of labour not strictly domestic; because, if once owning herself a prædial servant, she would be sensible that this confession extended by probability in the hearer’s thoughts to the having incurred indignities of this horrible kind. Haumette clearly thinks it more dignified for Joanna to have been darning the stockings of her horny-hoofed father, Monsieur D’Arc, than keeping sheep, lest she might then be suspected of having ever done something worse. But, luckily, there was no danger of that: Joanna never was in service, and my opinion is that her father should have mended his own stockings, since probably he was the party to make the holes in them, as many a better man than D’Arc does,—meaning by that not myself, because, though probably a better man than D’Arc, I protest against doing anything of the kind. If I lived even with Friday in Juan Fernandez, either Friday must do all the darning, or else it must go undone. The better men that I meant were the sailors in the British navy, every man of whom mends his own stockings. Who else is to do it? Do you suppose, reader, that the junior lords of the admiralty are under articles to darn for the navy?

<sup>1</sup> De Quincey quotes this story more than once in the course of his writings.—M.

The reason, meantime, for my systematic hatred of D'Arc is this :—There was a story current in France before the Revolution, framed to ridicule the pauper aristocracy, who happened to have long pedigrees and short rent rolls : viz. that a head of such a house, dating from the Crusades, was overheard saying to his son, a Chevalier of St. Louis, “Chevalier, as-tu donné au cochon à manger !” Now, it is clearly made out by the surviving evidence that D'Arc would much have preferred continuing to say, “Ma fille, as-tu donné au cochon à manger ?” to saying, “Pucelle d'Orleans, as-tu sauvé les fleurs-de-llys ?” There is an old English copy of verses which argues thus :—

“ If the man that turnips cries
Cry not when his father dies,
Then 'tis plain the man had rather
Have a turnip than his father.”

I cannot say that the logic of these verses was ever entirely to my satisfaction. I do not see my way through it as clearly as could be wished. But I see my way most clearly through D'Arc ; and the result is—that he would greatly have preferred not merely a turnip to his father, but the saving a pound or so of bacon to saving the Oriflamme of France.

It is probable (as M. Michelet suggests) that the title of Virgin or Pucelle had in itself, and apart from the miraculous stories about her, a secret power over the rude soldiery and partisan chiefs of that period ; for in such a person they saw a representative manifestation of the Virgin Mary, who, in a course of centuries, had grown steadily upon the popular heart.

As to Joanna's supernatural detection of the dauphin (Charles VII) amongst three hundred lords and knights, I am surprised at the credulity which could ever lend itself to that theatrical juggle. Who admires more than myself the sublime enthusiasm, the rapturous faith in herself, of this pure creature ? But I am far from admiring stage artifices which not La Pucelle, but the court, must have arranged ; nor can surrender myself to the conjurer's legerdemain, such as may be seen every day for a shilling. Southey's “Joan of Arc” was published in 1796. Twenty years alter, talking with Southey, I was surprised to find him still owning a secret bias in favour of Joan, founded on her detection of the dauphin. The story, for the benefit of the reader new to the case, was this—La Pucelle was first made known to the dauphin, and presented to his court, at Chinon: and here came her first trial. By way of testing her supernatural pretensions, she was to find out the royal personage amongst the whole ark of clean and unclean creatures. Failing in this coup d'essai, she would not simply disappoint many a beating heart in the glittering crowd that on different motives yearned for her success, but she would ruin herself, and, as the oracle within had told her, would, by ruining herself, ruin France. Our own Sovereign Lady Victoria rehearses annually a trial not so severe in degree, but the same in kind. She “pricks” for sheriffs. Joanna pricked for a king. But observe the difference: our own Lady pricks for two men out of three, Joanna for one man out of three hundred. Happy Lady of the Islands and the Orient!—she can go astray in her choice only by one half. to the extent of one half she must have the satisfaction of being right. And yet, even with these tight limits to the misery of a boundless discretion, permit me, Liege Lady, with all loyalty, to submit that now and then you prick with your pin the wrong man. But the poor child from Domrémy, shrinking under the gaze of a dazzling court—not because dazzling (for in visions she had seen those that were more so), but because some of them wore a scoffing smile on their features—how should she throw her line into so deep a river to angle for a king, where many a gay creature was sporting that masqueraded as kings in dress! Nay, even more than any true king would have done: for, in Southey’s version of the story, the dauphin says, by way of trying the virgin’s magnetic sympathy with royalty,

“On the throne,
I the while mingling with the menial throng,
Some courtier shall be seated”

This usurper is even crowned. “the jewelled crown shines on a menial’s head.” But, really, that is “un peu fort”; and the mob of spectators might raise a scruple whether our friend the jackdaw upon the throne, and the dauphin himself, were not grazing the shins of treason. For the dauphin could not lend more than belonged to him. According to the popular notion, he had no crown for himself; consequently none to lend, on any pretence whatever, until the consecrated Maid should take him to Rheims. This was the popular notion in France. But certainly it was the dauphin's interest to support the popular notion, as he meant to use the services of Joanna. For, if he were king already, what was it that she could do for him beyond Orleans? That is to say, what more than a merely military service could she render him? And, above all, if he were king without a coronation, and without the oil from the sacred ampulla, what advantage was yet open to him by celerity above his competitor, the English boy? Now was to be a race for a coronation. he that should win that race carried the superstition of France along with him. he that should first be drawn from the ovens of Rheims was under that superstition baked into a king.

La Pucelle, before she could be allowed to practise as a warrior, was put through her manual and platoon exercise, as a pupil in divinity, at the bar of six eminent men in wigs. According to Southey (v. 393, Book III, in the original edition of his "Joan of Arc"), she "appalled the doctors." It's not easy to do that: but they had some reason to feel bothered, as that surgeon would assuredly feel bothered who, upon proceeding to dissect a subject, should find the subject retaliating as a dissector upon himself, especially if Joanna ever made the speech to them which occupies v. 354-391, B. III. It is a double impossibility: 1st, because a piracy from Tindal's "Christianity as old as the Creation"—a piracy a parte ante, and by three centuries; 2dly, it is quite contrary to the evidence on Joanna's trial. Southey's "Joan" of A.D. 1796 (Cottle, Bristol) tells the doctors, amongst other secrets, that she never in her life attended—1st, Mass, nor 2d, the Sacramental Table; nor 3d, Confession. In the meantime, all this deistical confession of Joanna's, besides being suicidal for the interest of her cause, is opposed to the depositions upon both trials. The very best witness called from first to last deposes that Joanna attended these rites of her Church even too often; was taxed with doing so; and, by blushing, owned the charge as a fact, though certainly not as a fault. Joanna was a girl of natural piety, that saw God in forests, and hills, and fountains, but did not the less seek him in chapels and consecrated oratories

This peasant girl was self-educated through her own natural meditateness. If the reader turns to that divine passage in "Paradise Regained" which Milton has put into the mouth of our Saviour when first entering the wilderness, and musing upon the tendency of those great impulses growing within himself—

"Oh, what a multitude of thoughts at once Awakened in me swarm, while I consider
What from within I feel myself, and hear
What from without comes often to my ears, Ill sorting with my present state compared !
When I was yet a child, no childish play
To me was pleasing ; all my mind was set Serious to learn and know, and thence to do,
What might be public good ; myself I thought Born to that end"— he will have some notion of the vast reveries which brooded over the heart of Joanna in early girlhood, when the wings were budding that should carry her from Orleans to Rheims ; when the golden chariot was dimly revealing itself that should carry her from the kingdom of France Delivered to the Eternal Kingdom.

It is not requisite for the honour of Joanna, nor is there in this place room, to pursue her brief career of action. That, though wonderful, forms the earthly part of her story. The spiritual part is the saintly passion of her imprisonment, trial, and execution. It is unfortunate, therefore, for Southey's "Joan of Arc" (which, however, should always be regarded as a juvenile effort), that precisely when her real glory begins the poem ends. But this limitation of the interest grew, no doubt, from the constraint inseparably attached to the law of epic unity. Joanna's history bisects into two opposite hemispheres, and both could not have been presented to the eye in one poem, unless by sacrificing all unity of theme, or else by involving the earlier half, as a narrative episode, in the latter, which, however, might have been done, for it might have been communicated to a fellow-prisoner, or a confessor, by Joanna herself. It is sufficient, as concerns this section of Joanna's life, to say that she fulfilled, to the height of her promises, the restoration of the prostrate throne. France had become a province of England, and for the ruin of both, if such a yoke could be maintained. Dreadful pecuniary exhaustion caused the English energy to droop ; and that critical opening La Pucelle used with a corresponding felicity of audacity and suddenness (that were in themselves portentous) for introducing the wedge of French native resources, for rekindling the national pride, and for planting the dauphin once more upon his feet. When Joanna appeared, he had been on the point of giving up the struggle with the English, distressed as they were, and of flying to the south of France. She taught him to blush for such abject counsels. She liberated Orleans, that great city, so decisive by its fate for the issue of the war, and then beleaguered by the English with an elaborate application of engineering skill unprecedented in Europe. Entering the city after sunset on the 29th of April, she sang mass on Sunday, May 8, for the entire disappearance of the besieging force. On the 29th of June she fought and gained over the English the decisive battle of Patay ; on the 9th of July she took Troyes by a coup-de-main from a mixed garrison of English and Burgundians ; on the 15th of that month she carried the dauphin into Rheims ; on Sunday the 17th she crowned him ; and there she rested from her labour of triumph. All that was to be done she had now accomplished : what remained was — to suffer.

All this forward movement was her own : excepting one man, the whole Council was against her. Her enemies were all that drew power from earth. Her supporters were her own strong enthusiasm, and the headlong contagion by which she carried this sublime frenzy into the hearts of women, of soldiers, and of all who lived by labour. Henceforward she was thwarted, and the worst error that she committed was to lend the sanction of her presence to counsels which she had ceased to approve. But she had now accomplished the capital objects which her own visions had dictated. These involved all the rest. Errors were now less important ; and doubtless it had now become more difficult for herself to pronounce authentically what were errors. The noble girl had achieved, as by a rapture of motion, the capital end of clearing out a free space around her sovereign, giving him the power to move his arms with effect, and, secondly, the inappreciable end of winning for that sovereign what seemed to all France the heavenly ratification of his rights, by crowning him with the ancient solemnities. She had made it impossible for the English now to step before her. They were caught in an irretrievable blunder, owing partly to discord amongst the uncles of Henry VI, partly to a want of funds, but partly to the very impossibility which they believed to press with tenfold force upon any French attempt to forestall theirs. They laughed at such a thought; and, whilst they laughed, she did it. Henceforth the single redress for the English of this capital oversight, but which never could have redressed it effectually, was to vitiate and taint the coronation of Charles VII as the work of a witch. That policy, and not malice (as M. Michelet is so happy to believe), was the moving principle in the subsequent prosecution of Joanna. Unless they unhinged the force of the first coronation in the popular mind by associating it with power given from hell, they felt that the sceptre of the invader was broken.

But she, the child that, at nineteen, had wrought wonders so great for France, was she not elated? Did she not lose, as men so often have lost, all sobriety of mind when standing upon the pinnacle of success so giddy? Let her enemies declare. During the progress of her movement, and in the centre of ferocious struggles, she had manifested the temper of her feelings by the pity which she had everywhere expressed for the suffering enemy. She forwarded to the English leaders a touching invitation to unite with the French, as brothers, in a common crusade against infidels,—thus opening the road for a soldierly retreat. She interposed to protect the captive or the wounded, she mourned over the excesses of her countrymen; she threw herself off her horse to kneel by the dying English soldier, and to comfort him with such ministrations, physical or spiritual, as his situation allowed. “Nolebat,” says the evidence, “uti ense suo, aut quemquam interficere.” She sheltered the English that invoked her aid in her own quarters. She wept as she beheld, stretched on the field of battle, so many brave enemies that had died without confession. And, as regarded herself, her elation expressed itself thus :—On the day when she had finished her work, she wept ; for she knew that, when her triumphal task was done, her end must be approaching. Her aspirations pointed only to a place which seemed to her more than usually full of natural piety, as one in which it would give her pleasure to die. And she uttered, between smiles and tears, as a wish that unexpressibly fascinated her heart, and yet was half-fantastic, a broken prayer that God would return her to the solitudes from which he had drawn her, and suffer her to become a shepherdess once more. It was a natural prayer, because nature has laid a necessity upon every human heart to seek for rest and to shrink from torment. Yet, again, it was a half-fantastic prayer, because, from childhood upwards, visions that she had no power to mistrust, and the voices which sounded in her ear for ever, had long since persuaded her mind that for her no such prayer could be granted. Too well she felt that her mission must be worked out to the end, and that the end was now at hand. All went wrong from this time. She herself had created the funds out of which the French restoration should grow ; but she was not suffered to witness their development, or their prosperous application. More than one military plan was entered upon which she did not approve. But she still continued to expose her person as before. Severe wounds had not taught her caution. And at length, in a sortie from Compiègne (whether through treacherous collusion on the part of her own friends is doubtful to this day), she was made prisoner by the Burgundians, and finally surrendered to the English.

Now came her trial. This trial, moving of course under English influence, was conducted in chief by the Bishop of Beauvais. He was a Frenchman, sold to English interests, and hoping, by favour of the English leaders, to reach the highest preferment. Bishop that art, Archbishop that shalt be, Cardinal that mayest be, were the words that sounded continually in his ear ; and doubtless a whisper of visions still higher, of a triple crown, and feet upon the necks of kings, sometimes stole into his heart. M. Michelet is anxious to keep us in mind that this bishop was but an agent of the English. True. But it does not better the case for his countryman that, being an accomplice in the crime, making himself the leader in the persecution against the helpless girl, he was willing to be all this in the spirit, and with the conscious vileness of a cat's-paw. Never from the foundations of the earth was there such a trial as this, if it were laid open in all its beauty of defence, and all its hellishness of attack. Oh, child of France! shepherdless, peasant girl! trodden under foot by all around thee, how I honour thy flashing intellect, quick as God's lightning, and true as God's lightning to its mark, that ran before France and laggard Europe by many a century, confounding the malice of the ensnarer, and making dumb the oracles of falsehood! Is it not scandalous, is it not humiliating to civilisation, that, even at this day, France exhibits the horrid spectacle of judges examining the prisoner against himself; seducing him, by fraud, into treacherous conclusions against his own head; using the terrors of their power for extorting confessions from the frailty of hope; nay (which is worse), using the blandishments of condescension and snaky kindness for thawing into compliances of gratitude those whom they had failed to freeze into terror? Wicked judges! barbarian jurisprudence!—that, sitting in your own conceit on the summits of social wisdom, have yet failed to learn the first principles of criminal justice,—sit ye humbly and with docility at the feet of this girl from Domrémy, that tore your webs of cruelty into shreds and dust. “Would you examine me as a witness against myself?” was the question by which many times she defied their arts. Continually she showed that their interrogations were irrelevant to any business before the court, or that entered into the ridiculous charges against her. General questions were proposed to her on points of casuistical divinity; two-edged questions, which not one of themselves could have answered, without, on the one side, landing himself in heresy (as then interpreted), or, on the other, in some presumptuous expression of self-esteem. Next came a wretched Dominican, that pressed her with an objection, which, if applied to the Bible, would tax every one of its miracles with unsoundness. The monk had the excuse of never having read the Bible. M. Michelet has no such excuse;

and it makes one blush for him, as a philosopher, to find him describing such an argument as "weighty," whereas it is but a varied expression of rude Mahometan metaphysics. Her answer to this, if there were room to place the whole in a clear light, was as shattering as it was rapid. Another thought to entrap her by asking what language the angelic visitors of her solitude had talked,—as though heavenly counsels could want polyglot interpreters for every word, or that God needed language at all in whispering thoughts to a human heart. Then came a worse devil, who asked her whether the Archangel Michael had appeared naked. Not comprehending the vile insinuation, Joanna, whose poverty suggested to her simplicity that it might be the costliness of suitable robes which caused the demur, asked them if they fancied God, who clothed the flowers of the valleys, unable to find raiment for his servants. The answer of Joanna moves a smile of tenderness, but the disappointment of her judges makes one laugh exultingly. Others succeeded by troops, who upbraided her with leaving her father; as if that greater Father, whom she believed herself to have been serving, did not retain the power of dispensing with his own rules, or had not said that for a less cause than martyrdom man and woman should leave both father and mother.

On Easter Sunday, when the trial had been long proceeding, the poor girl fell so ill as to cause a belief that she had been poisoned. It was not poison. Nobody had any interest in hastening a death so certain. M Michelet, whose sympathies with all feelings are so quick that one would gladly see them always as justly directed, reads the case most truly. Joanna had a twofold malady. She was visited by a paroxysm of the complaint called home-sickness. The cruel nature of her imprisonment, and its length, could not but point her solitary thoughts, in darkness and in chains (for chained she was), to Domrémy. And the season, which was the most heavenly period of the spring, added stings to this yearning. That was one of her maladies—nostalgia, as medicine calls it; the other was weariness and exhaustion from daily combats with malice. She saw that everybody hated her, and thirsted for her blood; nay, many kind-hearted creatures that would have pitied her profoundly, as regarded all political charges, had their natural feelings warped by the belief that she had dealings with fiendish powers. She knew she was to die; that was not the misery: the misery was that this consummation could not be reached without so much intermediate strife, as if she were contending for some chance (where chance was none) of happiness, or were dreaming for a moment of escaping the inevitable. Why, then, did she contend? Knowing that she would reap nothing from answering her persecutors, why did she not retire by silence from the superfluous contest? It was because her quick and eager loyalty to truth would not suffer her to see it darkened by frauds which she could expose, but others, even of candid listeners, perhaps, could not; it was through that imperishable grandeur of soul which taught her to submit meekly and without a struggle to her punishment, but taught her not to submit—no, not for a moment—to calumny as to facts, or to misconstruction as to motives. Besides, there were secretaries all around the court taking down her words. That was meant for no good to her. But the end does not always correspond to the meaning. And Joanna might say to herself, “These words that will be used against me to-morrow and the next day perhaps in some nobler generation may rise again for my justification.” Yes, Joanna, they are rising even now in Paris, and for more than justification!

Woman, sister, there are some things which you do not execute as well as your brother, man; no, nor ever will. Pardon me if I doubt whether you will ever produce a great poet from your choirs, or a Mozart, or a Phidias, or a Michael Angelo, or a great philosopher, or a great scholar. By which last is meant—not one who depends simply on an infinite memory, but also on an infinite and electrical power of combination; bringing together from the four winds, like the angel of the resurrection, what else were dust from dead men’s bones, into the unity of breathing life. If you can create yourselves into any of these great creators, why have you not?

Yet, sister woman, though I cannot consent to find a Mozart or a Michael Angelo in your sex, cheerfully, and with the love that burns in depths of admiration, I acknowledge that you can do one thing as well as the best of us men—a greater thing than even Milton is known to have done, or Michael Angelo: you can die grandly, and as goddesses would die, were goddesses mortal. If any distant worlds (which may be the case) are so far ahead of us Tellurians in optical resources as to see distinctly through their telescopes all that we do on earth, what is the grandest sight to which we ever treat them? St. Peter's at Rome, do you fancy, on Easter Sunday, or Luxor, or perhaps the Himalayas? Oh no! my friend: suggest something better; these are baubles to them; they see in other worlds, in their own, far better toys of the same kind. These, take my word for it, are nothing. Do you give it up? The finest thing, then, we have to show them is a scaffold on the morning of execution. I assure you there is a strong muster in those far telescopic worlds, on any such morning, of those who happen to find themselves occupying the right hemisphere for a peep at us. How, then, if it be announced in some such telescopic world by those who make a livelihood of catching glimpses at our newspapers, whose language they have long since deciphered, that the poor victim in the morning's sacrifice is a woman? How, if it be published in that distant world that the sufferer wears upon her head, in the eyes of many, the garlands of martyrdom? How, if it should be some Marie Antoinette, the widowed queen, coming forward on the scaffold, and presenting to the morning air her head, turned grey by sorrow,—daughter of Cæsars kneeling down humbly to kiss the guillotine, as one that worships death? How, if it were the noble Charlotte Corday, that in the bloom of youth, that with the loveliest of persons, that with homage waiting upon her smiles wherever she turned her face to scatter them—homage that followed those smiles as surely as the carols of birds, after showers in spring, follow the reappearing sun and the racing of sunbeams over the hills—yet thought all these things cheaper than the dust upon her sandals, in comparison of deliverance from hell for her dear suffering France! Ah! these were spectacles indeed for those sympathising people in distant worlds; and some, perhaps, would suffer a sort of martyrdom themselves, because they could not testify their wrath, could not bear witness to the strength of love and to the fury of hatred that burned within them at such scenes, could not gather into golden urns some of that glorious dust which rested in the catacombs of earth

On the Wednesday after Trinity Sunday in 1431, being then about nineteen years of age, the Maid of Arc underwent her martyrdom. She was conducted before mid-day, guarded by eight hundred spearmen, to a platform of prodigious height, constructed of wooden billets supported by occasional walls of lath and plaster, and traversed by hollow spaces in every direction for the creation of air-currents. The pile "struck terror," says M. Michelet, "by its height", and, as usual, the English purpose in this is viewed as one of pure malignity. But there are two ways of explaining all that. It is probable that the purpose was merciful. On the circumstances of the execution I shall not linger. Yet, to mark the almost fatal felicity of M. Michelet in finding out whatever may injure the English name, at a moment when every reader will be interested in Joanna's personal appearance, it is really edifying to notice the ingenuity by which he draws into light from a dark corner a very unjust account of it, and neglects, though lying upon the high-road, a very pleasing one. Both are from English pens. Grafton, a chronicler, but little read, being a stiffnecked John Bull, thought fit to say that no wonder Joanna should be a virgin, since her "foule face" was a satisfactory solution of that particular merit. Holmshead, on the other hand, a chronicler somewhat later, every way more important, and at one time universally read, has given a very pleasing testimony to the interesting character of Joanna's person and engaging manners. Neither of these men lived till the following century, so that personally this evidence is none at all. Grafton sullenly and carelessly believed as he wished to believe; Holmshead took pains to inquire, and reports undoubtedly the general impression of France. But I cite the case as illustrating M. Michelet's candour.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Amongst the many ebullitions of M. Michelet's fury against us poor English are four which will be likely to amuse the reader; and they are the more conspicuous in collision with the justice which he sometimes does us, and the very indignant admiration which, under some aspects, he grants to us.

The circumstantial incidents of the execution, unless with more space than I can now command, I should be unwilling to relate. I should fear to injure, by imperfect report, a martyrdom which to myself appears so unspeakably grand. Yet, for a purpose, pointing not at Joanna, but at

1. Our English Literature he admires with some gnashing of teeth. He pronounces it "fine and sombre," but, I lament to add, "sceptical, Judaic, Satanic—in a word, antichristian." That Lord Byron should figure as a member of this diabolical corporation will not surprise men. It will surprise them to hear that Milton is one of its Satanic leaders. Many are the generous and eloquent Frenchmen, besides Chateaubriand, who have, in the course of the last thirty years, nobly suspended their own burning nationality, in order to render a more rapturous homage at the feet of Milton; and some of them have raised Milton almost to a level with angelic natures. Not one of them has thought of looking for him below the earth. As to Shakspeare, M. Michelet detects in him a most extraordinary mare's nest. It is this: he does "not recollect to have seen the name of God" in any part of his works. On reading such words, it is natural to rub one's eyes, and suspect that all one has ever seen in this world may have been a pure ocular delusion. In particular, I begin myself to suspect that the word "la gloire" never occurs in any Parisian journal. "The great English nation," says M. Michelet, "has one immense profound vice"—to wit, "pride." Why, really that may be true; but we have a neighbour not absolutely clear of an "immense profound vice," as like ours in colour and shape as cherry to cherry. In short, M. Michelet thinks us, by fits and starts, admirable,—only that we are detestable; and he would adore some of our authors, were it not that so intensely he could have wished to kick them.

2. M. Michelet thinks to lodge an arrow in our sides by a very odd remark upon Thomas à Kempis: which is, that a man of any conceivable European blood—a Finlander, suppose, or a Zantiote—might have written Tom; only not an Englishman. Whether an Englishman could have forged Tom must remain a matter of doubt, unless the thing had been tried long ago. That problem was intercepted for ever by Tom's perverseness in choosing to manufacture himself. Yet, since nobody is better aware than M. Michelet that this very point of Kempis having manufactured Kempis is furiously and hopelessly litigated, three or four nations claiming to have forged his work for him, the shocking old doubt will raise its snaky head once more—whether this forger, who rests in so much darkness, might not, after all, be of English blood. Tom, it may be feared, is known to modern English literature chiefly by an irreverent mention of his name in a line of Peter Pindar's (Dr. Wolcot) fifty years back, where he is described as

"Kempis Tom,

Who clearly shows the way to Kingdom Come."

Few in these days can have read him, unless in the Methodist version

M. Michelet—viz. to convince him that an Englishman is capable of thinking more highly of La Pucelle than even her admiring countrymen—I shall, in parting, allude to one or of John Wesley. Amongst those few, however, happens to be myself, which arose from the accident of having, when a boy of eleven, received a copy of the “De Imitatione Christi” as a bequest from a relation who died very young, from which cause, and from the external prettiness of the book,—being a Glasgow reprint by the celebrated Foulis, and gaily bound,—I was induced to look into it, and finally read it many times over, partly out of some sympathy which, even in those days, I had with its simplicity and devotional fervour, but much more from the savage delight I found in laughing at Tom’s Latinity. That, I freely grant to M. Michelet, is imitable. Yet, after all, it is not certain whether the original was Latin. But, however that may have been, if it is possible that M. Michelet<sup>1</sup> can be accurate in saying that there are no less than sixty French versions (not editions, observe, but separate versions) existing of the “De Imitatione,” how prodigious must have been the adaptation of the book to the religious heart of the fifteenth century! Excepting the Bible, but excepting that only in Protestant lands, no book known to man has had the same distinction. It is the most marvellous bibliographical fact on record.

3 Our English girls, it seems, are as faulty in one way as we English males in another. None of us men could have written the Opera Omnia of Mr à Kempis, neither could any of our girls have assumed male attire like La Pucelle. But why? Because, says Michelet, English girls and German think so much of an indecous. Well, that is a good fault, generally speaking. But M. Michelet ought to have remembered a fact in the martyrologies which justifies both parties—the French heroine for doing, and the general choir of English girls for not doing. A female saint, specially renowned in France, had, for a reason as weighty as Joanna’s—viz. expressly to shield her modesty amongst men—worn a male military harness. That reason and that example authorised La Pucelle, but our English girls, as a body, have seldom any such reason, and certainly no such saintly example, to plead. This excuses them. Yet, still, if it is indispensable to the national character that our young women should now and then trespass over the frontier of decorum, it then becomes a

---

<sup>1</sup> “If M. Michelet can be accurate”—However, on consideration, this statement does not depend on Michelet. The bibliographer Barbier has absolutely specified sixty in a separate dissertation, soixante traductions, amongst those even that have not escaped the search. The Italian translations are said to be thirty. As to mere editions, not counting the early MSS for half-a-century before printing was introduced, those in Latin amount to two thousand, and those in French to one thousand. Meantime, it is very clear to me that this astonishing popularity, so entirely unparalleled in literature, could not have existed except in Roman Catholic times, nor subsequently have lingered in any Protestant land. It was the denial of Scripture fountains to thirsty lands which made this slender rill of Scripture truth so passionately welcome.

two traits in Joanna's demeanour on the scaffold, and to one or two in that of the bystanders, which authorise me in questioning an opinion of his upon this martyr's firmness.

patriotic duty in me to assure M Michelet that we have such ardent females amongst us, and in a long series some detected in naval hospitals when too sick to remember their disguise, some on fields of battle; multitudes never detected at all, some only suspected, and others discharged without noise by war offices and other absurd people. In our navy, both royal and commercial, and generally from deep remembrances of slighted love, women have sometimes served in disguise for many years, taking contentedly their daily allowance of burgoo, biscuit, or cannon-balls—anything, in short, digestible or indigestible, that it might please Providence to send. One thing, at least, is to their credit: never any of these poor masks, with their deep silent remembrances, have been detected through murmuring, or what is mutually understood by “skulking.” So, for once, M Michelet has an erratum to enter upon the fly-leaf of his book in presentation copies.

4. But the last of these ebullitions is the most lively. We English, at Orleans, and after Orleans (which is not quite so extraordinary, if all were told), fled before the Maid of Arc. Yes, says M Michelet, you did deny it, if you can. Deny it, mon cher? I don't mean to deny it. Raubing away, in many cases, is a thing so excellent that no philosopher would, at times, condescend to adopt any other step. All of us nations in Europe, without one exception, have shown our philosophy in that way at times. Even people “qui ne se rendent pas” have deigned both to run and to shout “Sauve qui peut!” at odd times of sunset; though, for my part, I have no pleasure in recalling unpleasant remembrances to brave men; and yet, really, being so philosophic, they ought not to be unpleasant. But the amusing feature in M. Michelet's reproach is the way in which he improves and varies against us the charge of running, as if he were singing a catch. Listen to him. They “showed their backs,” did these English. (Hip, hip, hurrah! three times three!) “Behind good walls they let themselves be taken.” (Hip, hip! nine times nine!) They “ran as fast as their legs could carry them.” (Hurrah! twenty-seven times twenty-seven!) They “ran before a girl”; they did. (Hurrah! eighty-one times eighty-one!) This reminds one of criminal indictments on the old model in English courts, where (for fear the prisoner should escape) the crown lawyer varied the charge perhaps through forty counts. The law laid its guns so as to rake the accused at every possible angle. Whilst the indictment was reading, he seemed a monster of crime in his own eyes, and yet, after all, the poor fellow had but committed one offence, and not always that. N.B.—Not having the French original at hand, I make my quotations from a friend's copy of Mr. Walter Kelly's translation; which seems to me faithful, spirited, and idiomatically English—liable, in fact, only to the single reproach of occasional provincialisms.

The reader ought to be reminded that Joanna D'Arc was subjected to an unusually unfair trial of opinion. Any of the elder Christian martyrs had not much to fear of personal rancour. The martyr was chiefly regarded as the enemy of Cæsar ; at times, also, where any knowledge of the Christian faith and morals existed, with the enmity that arises spontaneously in the worldly against the spiritual. But the martyr, though disloyal, was not supposed to be therefore anti-national, and still less was individually hateful. What was hated (if anything) belonged to his class, not to himself separately. Now, Joanna, if hated at all, was hated personally, and in Rouen on national grounds. Hence there would be a certainty of calumny arising against her, such as would not affect martyrs in general. That being the case, it would follow of necessity that some people would impute to her a willingness to recant. No innocence could escape that. Now, had she really testified this willingness on the scaffold, it would have argued nothing at all but the weakness of a genial nature shrinking from the instant approach of torment. And those will often pity that weakness most who, in their own persons, would yield to it least. Meantime, there never was a calumny uttered that drew less support from the recorded circumstances. It rests upon no positive testimony, and it has a weight of contradicting testimony to stem. And yet, strange to say, M. Michelet, who at times seems to admire the Maid of Arc as much as I do, is the one sole writer amongst her friends who lends some countenance to this odious slander. His words are that, if she did not utter this word recant with her lips, she uttered it in her heart. "Whether she said the word is uncertain. but I affirm that she thought it."

Now, I affirm that she did not ; not in any sense of the word "thought" applicable to the case. Here is France calumniating La Pucelle · here is England defending her. M. Michelet can only mean that, on a priori principles, every woman must be presumed liable to such a weakness, that Joanna was a woman ; ergo, that she was liable to such a weakness. That is, he only supposes her to have uttered the word by an argument which presumes it impossible for anybody to have done otherwise. I, on the contrary, throw the onus of the argument not on presumable tendencies of nature, but on the known facts of that morning's execution, as recorded by multitudes. What else, I demand, than mere weight of metal, absolute nobility of deportment, broke the vast line of battle then arrayed against her? What else but her meek, saintly demeanour won, from the enemies that till now had believed her a witch, tears of rapturous admiration? "Ten thousand men," says M. Michelet himself — "ten thousand men wept"; and of these ten thousand the majority were political enemies knitted together by cords of superstition. What else was it but her constancy, united with her angelic gentleness, that drove the fanatic English soldier—who had sworn to throw a faggot on her scaffold, as his tribute of abhorrence, that did so, that fulfilled his vow — suddenly to turn away a penitent for life, saying everywhere that he had seen a dove rising upon wings to heaven from the ashes where she had stood? What else drove the executioner to kneel at every shrine for pardon to his share in the tragedy? And, if all this were insufficient, then I cite the closing act of her life as valid on her behalf, were all other testimonies against her. The executioner had been directed to apply his torch from below. He did so. The fiery smoke rose upwards in billowing volumes. A Dominican monk was then standing almost at her side. Wrapped up in his sublime office, he saw not the danger, but still persisted in his prayers. Even then, when the last enemy was racing up the fiery stairs to seize her, even at that moment did this noblest of girls think only for him, the one friend that would not forsake her, and not for herself; bidding him with her last breath to care for his own preservation, but to leave her to God. That girl, whose latest breath ascended in this sublime expression of self-oblivion, did not utter the word recant either with her lips or in her heart. No; she did not, though one should rise from the dead to swear it.

Bishop of Beauvais! thy victim died in fire upon a scaffold — thou upon a down bed. But, for the departing minutes of life, both are oftentimes alike. At the farewell crisis, when the gates of death are opening, and flesh is resting from its struggles, oftentimes the tortured and the torturer have the same truce from carnal torment; both sink together into sleep, together both sometimes kindle into dreams. When the mortal mists were gathering fast upon you two, bishop and shepherd girl—when the pavilions of life were closing up their shadowy curtains about you—let us try, through the gigantic glooms, to decipher the flying features of your separate visions.

The shepherd girl that had delivered France—she, from her dungeon, she, from her baring at the stake, she, from her duel with fire, as she entered her last dream—saw Domrémy, saw the fountain of Domrémy, saw the pomp of forests in which her childhood had wandered. That Easter festival which man had denied to her languishing heart—that resurrection of spring-time, which the darkness of dungeons had intercepted from her, hungering after the glorious liberty of forests—were by God given back into her hands, as jewels that had been stolen from her by robbers. With those, perhaps (for the minutes of dreams can stretch into ages), was given back to her by God the bliss of childhood. By special privilege for her might be created, in this farewell dream, a second childhood, innocent as the first; but not, like that, sad with the gloom of a fearful mission in the rear. This mission had now been fulfilled. The storm was weathered; the skirts even of that mighty storm were drawing off. The blood that she was to reckon for had been exacted; the tears that she was to shed in secret had been paid to the last. The hatred to herself in all eyes had been faced steadily, had been suffered, had been survived. And in her last fight upon the scaffold she had triumphed gloriously; victoriously she had tasted the stings of death. For all, except this comfort from her farewell dream, she had died—died, amidst the tears of ten thousand enemies—died, amidst the drums and trumpets of armies—died, amidst peals redoubling upon peals, volleys upon volleys, from the saluting clasons of martyrs.

Bishop of Beauvais! because the guilt-burdened man is in dreams haunted and waylaid by the most frightful of his crimes, and because upon that fluctuating mirror—rising (like the mocking mirrors of mirage in Arabian deserts) from the

fens of death—most of all are reflected the sweet countenances which the man has laid in ruins ; therefore I know, bishop, that you also, entering your final dream, saw Domrémy. That fountain, of which the witnesses spoke so much, showed itself to your eyes in pure morning dews : but neither dews, nor the holy dawn, could cleanse away the bright spots of innocent blood upon its surface. By the fountain, bishop, you saw a woman seated, that hid her face. But, as you draw near, the woman raises her wasted features. Would Domrémy know them again for the features of her child ? Ah, but you know them, bishop, well ! Oh, mercy ! what a groan was that which the servants, waiting outside the bishop's dream at his bedside, heard from his labouring heart, as at this moment he turned away from the fountain and the woman, seeking rest in the forests afar off. Yet not so to escape the woman, whom once again he must behold before he dies. In the forests to which he prays for pity, will he find a respite ? What a tumult, what a gathering of feet is there ! In glades where only wild deer should run armies and nations are assembling ; towering in the fluctuating crowd are phantoms that belong to departed hours. There is the great English Prince, Regent of France. There is my Lord of Winchester, the princely cardinal, that died and made no sign. There is the Bishop of Beauvais, clinging to the shelter of thickets. What building is that which hands so rapid are raising ? Is it a martyr's scaffold ? Will they burn the child of Domrémy a second time ? No : it is a tribunal that rises to the clouds ; and two nations stand around it, waiting for a trial. Shall my Lord of Beauvais sit again upon the judgment-seat, and again number the hours for the innocent ? Ah no ! he is the prisoner at the bar. Already all is waiting : the mighty audience is gathered, the Court is hurrying to their seats, the witnesses are arrayed, the trumpets are sounding, the judge is taking his place. Oh ! but this is sudden. My lord, have you no counsel ? " Counsel I have none : in heaven above, or on earth beneath, counsellor there is none now that would take a brief from me : all are silent." Is it, indeed, come to this ? Alas ! the time is short, the tumult is wondrous, the crowd stretches away into infinity ; but yet I will search in it for somebody to take your brief: I know of somebody that will be your counsel. Who is this that cometh from Domrémy? Who is she in bloody coronation robes from Rheims? Who is she that cometh with blackened flesh from walking the furnaces of Rouen? This is she, the shepherd girl, counsellor that had none for herself, whom I choose, bishop, for yours. She it is, I engage, that shall take my lord's brief. She it is, bishop, that would plead for you: yes, bishop, SHE,—when heaven and earth are silent.

END OF VOL V

to take your brief: I know of somebody that will be your counsel. Who is this that cometh from Domrémy? Who is she in bloody coronation robes from Rheims? Who is she that cometh with blackened flesh from walking the furnaces of Rouen? This is she, the shepherd girl, counsellor that had none for herself, whom I choose, bishop, for yours. She it is, I engage, that shall take my lord's brief. She it is, bishop, that would plead for you: yes, bishop, SHE,--when heaven and earth are silent.

END OF VOL. V